The Office of the British
Chargé d'Affaires,
PEKING.

4 January, 1967.

Dear David,

Handwritten notes and signatures:
The document is a letter from the British Charge d'Affaires in Peking to David Wilson. It discusses the Cultural Revolution and the People's Liberation Army. The letter is dated 4 January 1967. There are several handwritten signatures and initials, including "The Secretary", "FCI/S.", and "W.C.". There is also a handwritten note "17.1" and "17.1" near the bottom of the letter.

During the past few days the People's Daily and Peking's posters have provided us with material which may shed a little more light on what has happened (and what is going to happen) in that vital component in the Cultural Revolution - the People's Liberation Army.

2. You will now have seen in NCNA (No. 010113) translated excerpts of the Liberation Army Daily New Year editorial which was published in the People's Daily on 2 January, and also the summary in our telegram No. 4 of 3 January. The five principles for army work in 1967 set out in the editorial confirm the heavy emphasis on participation in the Cultural Revolution and on political and non-military rôles which we have seen during recent months and which was in accordance with the directive from Mao revealed in the People's Daily editorial of 1 August (telegram No. 639 of 2 August).

3. The first principle demands still further improvement in the Army's performance in the Cultural Revolution and the study of Mao. There is a strong hint of difficulties with "leading cadres", who are directed to "take the lead in speaking out their innermost thoughts and in struggling against their own ego". This section also contains an interesting reference to the Kutien meeting of December 1929, which was an occasion when the military policies advocated by Mao were opposed by the field commanders.

4. The third principle, that, at the same time as being a fighting force, the Army "must do well as a work force and a production force", is pure Mao, an uncompromising restatement of the tenets of the revolutionary days. The Army is to take a "long-term view" of construction work, do well at agricultural and sideline production and "gradually set up some small and medium-sized factories". This programme would certainly not seem to be one which would produce a well-trained and mobile modern army, nor does it suggest any intention to indulge in external military adventures. The injunction that the Army must "train new Communist people who can handle both military and civilian affairs and both industry and agriculture" suggests that it is envisaged that the spread of P.L.A. people into all fields of Chinese life is expected to continue.

5. The passage on the fourth principle concentrates on the "bold" promotion of commanders to "responsible, crucially important posts", and cites the three criteria which Lin Piao has laid down for the training, selection and promotion of cadres. Not surprisingly, these call for people who "hold high the red banner of Mao's thought", put proletarian politics to the fore, and are linked with the masses and possess revolutionary verve and drive. Military proficiency is not mentioned, but is no doubt meant to be included in the phrase "of course, we must also take note of the lesser points". The three criteria are the "essentials".

6. The fifth principle stresses the need for vigilance and the preparation to smash any aggression by the United States. There must be more study of Mao's writings on people's war. Mao's works should be /used used as the basic textbooks in military training, although technical skills and close-quarter and night-fighting should also be mastered. Political and ideological work among the frontier guards, island garrisons, and units engaged in production work, apparently needs to be strengthened.

7. There is a call to the P.L.A. to put the militia "on a solid basis organisationally, politically and militarily". It will be interesting to see if this is put into effect. We have heard little of the militia in recent months. Finally, the editorial confirms that the P.L.A. is to train the students and Red Guards of middle schools and colleges and is asked to regard this "as an important political task that should be accomplished".

8. Also of interest in connexion with the P.L.A. have been recent articles in the People's Daily marking the thirtieth anniversary of the publication of Mao's essay "Strategic Problems in China's Revolutionary Wars". Some of these were used merely as vehicles to carry standard political themes (e.g. the need for the practical application of Mao's Thought - "we learn to fight by fighting", etc.), but those of 24 December (NCNA 122317) and, especially, that of 30 December (NCNA 123037 and 123106) have a more direct military relevance.

9. Again, we have a firm restatement of Mao's military theories - the need to wage a people's war which relies on the masses. Examples from the P.L.A.'s past achievements, the "revolutionary practice of the world's people" and the successes of the people of South Viet Nam, are cited to prove that people's war is the only way to defeat modern armaments and equipment "however developed". The Soviet revisionists are attacked for their belief in the "bourgeois theory that weapons are omnipotent" and that "in modern war, rockets and nuclear weapons can decide everything".

10. The 30 December article then (NCNA 123106) rehearsed the 'classic' Mao doctrines - one against ten strategically, ten against one tactically; one must fight to annihilate, not just to rout; guerilla warfare is basic, but lose no chance for mobile warfare under favourable conditions; lure the enemy by giving up some areas; never divide forces to defend all the positions.

11. The final section discusses the correct political and military lines, "which do not emerge spontaneously and without contention", and stresses the need to carry on an irreconcilable struggle against all kinds of erroneous lines. If they are not defeated "we shall not be able to win victory in the revolution and the revolutionary war".

12. It is quite possible that these articles are published for the benefit of those directing the Communist struggle in Viet Nam, to convince them that Mao's methods of people's warfare offer the only way to ultimate victory, and perhaps to argue against over-ambitious North Vietnamese military tactics. It is also possible, however, that they are intended yet again to spell out very clearly to any members of the P.L.A. who may still harbour tendencies to "professionalism" that the Chinese forces must not be tempted along a bourgeois and revisionist path.

CONFIDENTIAL

13. The People's Daily editorial of 2 August indicated that professionalism was at the root of the differences within the P.L.A., and evidence is now steadily accumulating that this is the case. John Boyd, in his letter 1200/66 of 21 December, referred to the charges on this score levelled at Lo Jui-ching. In the latest crop of posters (my 1010/67 of 4 January) we now have attacks on Yeh Chien-ying (49 and 51) for opposing the idea of a revolutionary army and suppressing students. The attack on Yeh is all the more surprising as he has only recently emerged as a Member of the Secretariat, and one of his speeches (originally delivered in July 1965) was selected for prominent publication in the People's Daily on 2 August, 1966 (Alan Donald's letter 1220/66'S' of 12 August). In this speech Yeh emphasised that Mao had consistently opposed the "purely military viewpoint and warlordism". One should at this point sound a note of caution before writing off Yeh Chien-ying. The posters, though some are prominent, are as yet few in numbers.

14. The reports of the "arrests" of Liang Pi-yeh, Deputy Director of the General Political Department of the P.L.A., and Hsiao Hsiang-jung, Director of the General Office of the Ministry of National Defence (item 28 of poster collection), offer no information about their crimes. Liang was missing on 1 August (John Boyd's letter 1200/66 of 28 September), and therefore, in his case at least, his fall is not entirely unexpected. Two other military figures under consistent attack are Chao Erh-lu and Cheng Han-t'ao (item 3), who are said to be persisting in the Lo Jui-ch'ing line. Our records show Chao as a member of the National Defence Council, but we have no knowledge of Cheng. We should welcome any information on these two which may be available to you or other recipients of this letter.

15. I am copying this to Emrys Davies in Hong Kong, Miss Draycott in I.R.D., Brewer in J.R.D., Tozer in D.I.S. and Gilmore in Washington.

Yours ever,

R.W.

THE CULTURAL REVOLUTION AND THE PLA.

The "reorganisation" of the Cultural Revolution Group in the PLA and the Liberation Army Daily editorial of 14 January are the first major official admissions since the Liberation Army Daily editorial of 2 August, 1966, that all is not well within the armed forces. The August editorial referred to a recent struggle against "representatives of the bourgeoisie .... who had got hold of important posts in the army". This appeared to have been a belated explanation for the removal of Lo Jui-ch'ing, Chief of Staff, probably at the turn of the year. Although it is difficult to believe that the dismissal of Lo and a few of his supporters e.g. Liang Pi-yeh and Hsiao Hsiang-jung would have put an end to differences of view, the PLA has been presented since August as being solidly behind Mao, Lin Piao and the Cultural Revolution. There have, however, been occasional indications that the PLA has needed attention - Lin Piao's call in October to raise Mao-study to a new stage, and Hsiao Hua's address to an Air Force meeting - and some indication that units of the PLA in Peking may have been out of step in its relations with Red Guards - reports of clashes in an Academy in Peking. We are now informed that although considerable success has been achieved in revolutionising the PLA since Lin Piao took charge of the Military Affairs Commission, "bourgeois ideology" still exists and the struggle against it is sharp and complicated. This struggle is declared to be serious because the PLA is the pillar of the dictatorship of the proletariat and the "guns of the people must be in the hands of those loyal to Chairman Mao ....."

2. Resistance is said to come primarily from those in authority taking the capitalist road (presumably revisionists) and die-hards clinging to the bourgeois line (presumably "professionals"). Resistance also comes from "cadres within our Party whose world outlook has not been really remoulded", who are muddle-headed and without a proper understanding of the aims of the revolution. Resistance takes various forms. Those taking the capitalist road (like their counterparts in the Party and Government) wave red flags while resorting to all sorts of tricks to suppress the revolutionary left. Others take the view that "there is no great problem with the army and it does not matter whether or not the great cultural revolution is conducted there." These may be the "professionals" who object to the time that has to be devoted to political work. Then again, there are those who while prepared to support the revolutionary left, have little enthusiasm for its excesses and try to find "a middle way or compromise".

3. The editorial observes that arrangements for conducting the cultural revolution in the army should be different from those of other organisations. The significance of this is no doubt that the armed forces have to have a discipline of their own and this must be observed. The editorial goes on to say that the revolution is at present unfolding in the "higher-level leading organs, military academies, schools and cultural and art organisations". These bodies are exhorted to draw upon the experience of the revolutionary rebel groups in Shanghai, and, through struggle, eliminate the die-hards and those taking the capitalist road. Other units of the army are not called upon to expose and eradicate opponents of the cultural revolution, but to concentrate upon study and improving their understanding of the issues of the revolution.

4. There can be little doubt that some resistance to the cultural revolution has been developing in the PLA, but it is not possible to judge the seriousness of it from this editorial. Some of the trouble no doubt has its origins in army relations with the Red Guards, particularly in the period of confused Red Guard activity when some clashes occurred. It also seems clear that there is still considerable uneasiness in the army about the increasing emphasis on political activity at the expense of military training. But the major question would seem to be the extent to which the "higher-level leading organs" have been questioning the wisdom of the methods of the cultural revolution in so far as they may be seen to threaten the stability of government and economic development of the country. It is possible that the inter-locking Party-PLA machinery is tending to create a sympathetic understanding between leaders of the two organisations not only at the centre but in the regions and provinces.

Far Eastern Department.THE CULTURAL REVOLUTION AND THE P.L.A.

You have no doubt noticed in Summary of World Broadcasts FE/2386 of 8 February a report from Nanchang that a rally on 4 February decided to "rebel" against the commemoration of Army Day on 1 August - the anniversary of the Nanchang uprising in 1927. The broadcast described this development as "another clap of spring thunder" in the struggle against those taking the capitalist road. The denunciation of such a well-established anniversary is indeed surprising; Army Day had received mention only a few days before in connection with the re-printing of Mao's 1929 article "On correcting mistaken ideas in the Party".

2. It was argued at the rally that 1 August should never have been chosen since the mutiny in the Nationalist army did not really lay the foundations of the People's Liberation Army. The Nanchang rebels fought their battles as purely military actions; they had no understanding of people's war and consequently lost their battles. It was Mao who provided the correct line for building a people's army after the Autumn Harvest uprising in Hunan in 1927. It was Mao who formed the proto-type of the People's Army - the Worker-Peasant Red Army.

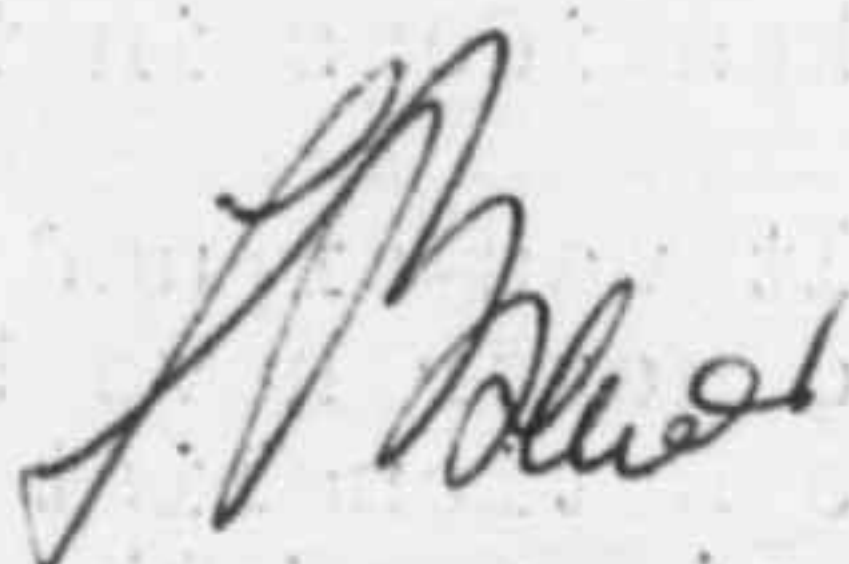

3. All this sounds as though the rally was just seeking to put the record straight, but that this was not so was shown in the references made to those who were alleged to be decrying Mao's strategic principles:-

"A handful of schemers and careerists in the Party who have taken the capitalist road, with the guts of dogs, have gone all out to distort, turn upside down and fabricate the history of the revolution, working hard to embellish the Nanchang 1st August uprising, in order to sing the praises of their own virtue. They have publicly opposed your great strategic principle of surrounding the towns with the rural areas and seizing the towns last, which gained victory in the Chinese revolution. They have gone all out to create counter-revolutionary public opinion, trying to usurp the Party, Army and Government, vainly hoping to make China change colour."

The report also emphasised that Mao's principle that the Party has absolute leadership over the Army must be preserved - "we certainly cannot allow the gun to control the Party."

4. These are quite strong imputations that there are important people in the Army standing out against Mao, and that they are people who had a leading part in the Nanchang Uprising. Chou En-lai, Ho Lung, Chu Teh, Lin Piao and Ch'en Yi were all involved in the uprising, but it would seem that of these the finger is most likely to be pointed at Ho Lung. The rally sent a message to Mao, but to date we have seen no other reports of similar action to denounce 1 August Army Day, and the national press has not yet given this event any publicity as far as we are aware. The rally may, therefore, have been a local affair with a purely local initiative.

It is certainly an interesting and confusing episode. Perhaps the target is Ho Lung, but Chou En-lai and Lin Piao were involved with equal prominence. In fact who is the present leadership, except Tiao Tzang?

Addressed to Foreign Office telegram No. 205 of 8 February.

Repeated for information to Washington POLAD Singapore and Hong Kong.

People's Daily of 18 February carries article describing role of People's Liberation Army in Shansi after seizure of power.

2. Army is helping masses to consolidate and establish "revolutionary order", resolutely suppressing counter revolutionary activities and taking over or protecting organs of propaganda, public security, government administration, judiciary, industrial enterprises, communications etc. After the seizure of power manifestations of "small group mentality" and individualism appeared in the ranks of the proletarian revolutionaries and threatened unity. P.L.A. has conducted propaganda effort to correct these tendencies.

3. Article reports that there have also been people among revolutionaries who have maintained that no one in authority should be trusted and all should be swept away. P.L.A. have emphasised to these people importance of dealing with leading cadres in accordance with Mao's teaching. Masses should carry out class analysis and not merely consider cadres performance at a particular time, but all their work. If cadres have made mistakes during the movement they should be helped to reform.

4. Proletarian revolutionaries have come to realise that there are four advantages of uniting with the revolutionary leading cadres.

- (a) It strengthens Proletarian Revolutionary Party,
- (b) it isolates and strikes a blow at the small handfull in authority following the capitalist road,
- (c) it is beneficial to the work of consolidation and construction after the seizure of power,
- (d) it is helpful for "grasping revolution and promoting production" so that it is possible quickly to establish a new production system.

5. Same issue People's Daily also carries commentator article emphasising that role played by P.L.A. in Shansi provides an excellent model for the army throughout the whole country.

Addressed to Foreign Office telegram No. 234 of 24 February. Repeated for information to Washington, Polad Singapore and Governor Hong Kong.

People's Daily of 24 February reprints editorial from today's issue of Liberation Army Daily entitled "The People's Liberation Army is the pillar of the dictatorship of the proletariat".

Following is summary.

2. P.L.A. has the tasks of preparing for war, defending China and protecting proletarian cultural revolution. Revolution is now in key stage in struggle between the two lines and the enemy is collapsing. However, small handful in party are still frantically attempting counter blows and imperialists, revisionists and reactionaries in various countries are colluding with internal class enemies to create an anti-China tide, even to the point of military provocation.

3. P.L.A. must therefore increase its vigilance and its organisational discipline so that it unites its actions under the banner of Mao's thought. Proletarian revolutionary discipline is an essential condition to a victory for the revolution and this is the policy laid down by the Central Committee and the Military Affairs Committee headed by Chairman Mao.

4. P.L.A. must at all times and in all situations resolutely uphold highest degree of discipline. In the present extremely acute and complex struggle it is essential that the P.L.A. adheres to the "three points of discipline" and "the eight points of attention". Only in this way can its fighting strength be increased and unity with the masses enhanced. P.L.A. must carry out the correct policy of the "three-way alliance".

Dear Appleyard,

You wrote to Far Eastern Department (reference 1200/66) on 12th October 1966, with a copy inter alia to Tozer, about an article referring to the Scientific and Technical Commission for National Defence of the PLA. We have received a comment on this from the Scientific Intelligence Group, JIB(Australia) which I am passing on in case you have not had it by any other channel:

"(a) This is the first reference we have seen to the Chinese People's Liberation Army National Defence Scientific and Technical Committee. The article reveals that this Committee has subordinate units but does not in any way indicate the function of the Committee or its units.

(b) The conference was convened by the Committee and was "a delegates' conference of activists in the study of the works of Chairman Mao". From this we conclude that the delegates need not have been scientists but were probably Party cadres from the various units subordinate to the Committee.

(c) We have recently obtained a full translation of the article concerned and from it we deduce that the purpose of the conference was to insure that a proper attitude was being taken to the Cultural Revolution and also that it be made publicly clear that scientists were active in the field under rigorous conditions and achieving considerable success.

(d) We would not care to speculate as to whether the Committee is responsible for development and testing of military nuclear weapons as there is nothing really in the article to suggest this."

We ourselves have nothing to add to this. As a general observation on the state of the thoughts of Chairman Mao, one can see a close analogy with the former Russian practice of acknowledging in scientific papers the guidance derived from the thoughts of Lenin (and/or Marx, Stalin etc) and from the inspiration of the Party. The most eminent scientists, whose professional writings would command world-wide respect, indulged in this type of dutiful acknowledgment. It was not necessarily cant, humbug or the price of a peaceful career. Nor did it imply that Lenin et al had given any direct guidance on, for example, the behaviour of plasma.

The scientist and technician, it has to be remembered, can be a dangerous member of a Communist society in that he can, in the description of newly discovered phenomena or the formulation of theory, propound ideas which are in opposition to the fundamentals of Communist belief, and which can be used or misused, deliberately or accidentally, in or out of context, to challenge dogma before the implications of its development have been properly assessed. Moreover he is thought to be especially exposed, and therefore vulnerable, to Western thought; he can also, if influenced by the "idealistic" Western doctrine of pursuing knowledge for its own sake, waste resources and retard practical developments.

As a personal suggestion of what these - by Western standards, hypocritical - acknowledgments mean, I would offer an interpretation something on the following lines: "In pursuing my work, I have been assisted by the practical approach to the techniques of the pursuit of progress evolved collectively by the Communist Party and formulated by the expositions and examples of the Communist leaders. Achievement has therefore been encouraged by the positive certainty that a solution expressible in materialist terms is inherent in any correctly expressed problem, and the intellectual tools provided by Communist method have given me a powerful advantage in the particular application described here. This has required me at every stage in my observations or thinking to test my result within the frame of reference of Communist ideology; any apparent incompatibility or difficulty in expression in materialist terms must result from my own limitations, and therefore encouraged me to define where my knowledge or concepts were inadequate and thus led me to a deeper understanding of the problem. As a responsible member of Communist society I am not here arrogantly presenting my personal observations or views, but work which owes its objectivity to the collective approach, has been tested rigorously against the main body of Communist philosophy, and is at no point dependent upon "idealistic" concepts not expressible in materialist terms. Furthermore, since knowledge is acquired for the benefit of the community and not for personal interests, I have consciously tested my work at each stage against my responsibilities towards the material progress of the community".

Perhaps in the Chinese environment the content of hypocrisy may be higher, the expression cruder or the formalism more pronounced, but the Russians expended a heavy investment in the ideological training of their scientists, and it would be surprising if the Chinese did not find the same necessity. In the USSR the ending of the "personality cult" makes it less necessary to personify the doctrinal framework in the names of the leaders - a development which Maoists are perhaps unlikely to favour!

Dear John,

J.C. Wilson
2/iii

It has become a truism to say that the key role in the Cultural Revolution is now being played by the People's Liberation Army. We therefore thought that it might be helpful to offer some comments on how we see the present position within the PLA and its relationship with the leadership, the Party and the revolutionaries.

2. We could, conveniently, take up the story from 13 January, when it was announced that the Cultural Group in the PLA had been reorganised (our telegram No. 46 of 13 January) and was to include several civilians who had played a prominent part in the national movement, including Chiang Ch'ing herself as Adviser. The composition of this Group and the press articles which greeted its formation (such as the Liberation Army Daily editorial of 14 January - our telegram No. 59 of 16 January) strongly suggested that its purpose was to conduct a purge throughout the Chinese forces. This seemed to represent a surprising blow to the prestige of Lin Piao, whose name, interestingly enough, was not mentioned in the Liberation Army Daily Editorial of 13 January (para. 3 of our telegram No. 46), and of the PLA itself, which had hitherto been held up to the rest of Chinese society as a model of ideological rectitude. It was also surprising that the extremists were prepared to risk disrupting the Army at a time when the Cultural Revolution movement was already in troubled water, following its extension to the factories and the countryside. The most likely explanation seemed to be simply that they were overweeningly confident that they could ride out the storm they were creating. Another possibility is that the extremists, already appreciating that the Army would soon have to be called in to assist them, decided that a rapid purge was essential before it could be relied upon to give them effective help.

3. The Liberation Army Daily of 14 January disclosed that a "very sharp and complicated" struggle was in progress in the Army against the "handful" and soon the heads began to roll. One of the first to go was Liu Chih-chien, Deputy Director of the General Political Department and formerly responsible for the Cultural Revolution in the Army. He had also been one of the members of Chen Po-ta's C.R. Group. He was soon followed by a much bigger fish, Ho Lung. He was accused, inter alia, of retaining a wide network of accomplices within the PLA and a number of military leaders fell or were seriously attacked on this count, such as two of the Deputy Commanders of the Air Force Liu Chen and Ch'eng Chun and the Political Commissar of the Navy Su Chen-hua.

4. Soon after this, the most eminent Chinese soldier of all Chu Teh, also came under heavy attack and was disgraced. There were a number of other casualties in Peking and a few indications that the purge was to spread to the Regions. For example, according to a Red Guard newspaper, Huang Hsin-t'ing, Commander of Ch'engtu Military Region and another linked with the activities of Ho Lung, was paraded through the streets and by 18 February was being described as the "former" Commander. <sup>bills</sup>

5. One curious episode concerned Hsiao Hua, the high ranking and apparently powerful Director of the General Political Department. Attacks on him appeared, many in handbills distributed in Peking by soldiers, around 20 January but were soon suppressed. This was later said to have been the work of the Commander of Peking Military Region, Yang Yung, who was reported to have "jumped the gun" following a meeting of the Military Affairs Commission on 19 January. Yang quickly paid for his mistake. The head of the PLA CRG, Hsu Hsiang-ch'ien, was reported by a Red Guard newspaper to have told revolutionaries to "do what they liked with him". He was paraded on 22 January and has been under sustained attack since. There were reports that Chou En-lai had said, ominously, that the question of Hsiao Hua was an internal one which was still to be settled. Whatever this may mean, Hsiao continues to appear.

6. Another curious development was a speech by Chou En-lai on 21 January in which he apparently found it necessary to defend Chen Po-ta and deny that Ch'en would ever slander the PLA. It seems fairly clear that within and around the Army the turmoil was considerable. Notwithstanding this, on 23 January Mao was reported to have sent Lin an instruction telling him to cancel previous directives and to throw the Army into the CR on the side of the revolutionaries. According to Chou En-lai, the decision not to intervene had been taken at a meeting of the Military Affairs Commission on 4 November ("this was the wish of Liu Chih-ch'ien"). The change of policy could be interpreted as a reflection of confidence of the extremists in the loyalty of the PLA and of their belief that Chiang Ch'ing purge committee had done the work it had been set up to do on 11 January. A more likely explanation, however, would seem to be that Mao had, in fact, no other choice. His revolution was running into such difficulties that he had to call in the Army, hoping that enough had been done to ensure its loyalty. It was at once clear that the move had met with opposition. The Liberation Army Daily of 24 January (People's Daily 25 January) spoke of those who maintained that the Army should not get mixed up in the movement.

7. Thus, the PLA moved in and soon the concept of the tripartite alliance of revolutionary organisations, the military and revolutionary cadres was produced and presented as the new key to seizing and retaining power. The results, however, were surprisingly meagre for the revolutionary left. Apart from Shanghai, only Shansi, Heilungkiang, Kweichow, Fukien and the city of Tsingtao could be declared in the national press as places where power had been seized in a satisfactory manner. In much the greater part of China, the central provinces and the sensitive border areas, things do not appear to have gone according to plan. There have been many reports from these regions that the Army had in fact entered into the political area but was supporting the wrong side. The revolutionaries were being suppressed.

8. In Peking we can know only very little of what is going on in the provinces and so it is difficult for us to say what is happening and why. In some cases, it is likely that the military commanders simply do not know which group of revolutionaries and revolutionary cadres to support. The advice they are given in the press, that they should choose those who are really following Mao's line must be impossible to carry out in practice. This may well be the explanation of what is happening in Sian (Leonard Appleyard's letter 1018/67) of 1 March), where the PLA are not interfering in the squabbles between the revolutionary groups. In many more cases, however, it seems highly likely that the military commanders are settling for the policy by which they can most easily maintain or restore law and order. This is likely to be by working in conjunction with some of their former colleagues in the Provincial and Regional Party Committees to suppress those groups who try to cause trouble, condemning them as "counter-revolutionary" organisations who are disturbing revolutionary unity and discipline. Commanders in the border regions must be particularly anxious to keep the situation in check and it is noteworthy that there have been many reports of the suppression of revolutionaries in Tibet, Sinkiang and Inner Mongolia.

9. It was interesting to see that at the same time that the PLA was stepping into the Cultural Revolution, the purge within its ranks seemed to be stopped. On 28 January, the Military Affairs

/Commission

Commission published on eight point directive, which Chou En-lai tells us was drawn up by Mao and Lin, which in effect suppressed the Cultural Revolution (i.e. attacks on superiors) in the Army. Since this date there have been only a few isolated attacks on military figures, except for the complaints of would-be revolutionaries in the provinces. The timing of this development suggests that the Army may have agreed to join in the Revolution on 23 January in return for an undertaking that the purge would be called off but, I need hardly say, this is only speculation.

10. One of the biggest puzzles concerning the PLA at present is the position of Lin Piao. In our telegram No. 239 of 25 February we set out some of the reasons why there are now suspicions that he may have suffered a setback. Curiously enough, the three issues of the People's Daily which have appeared since the telegram was sent have each contained references to Lin Piao. Furthermore on 26 February, I bought a remarkable document on the streets of Peking which described the achievements of Lin Piao in glowing colours and also carried a paean of fulsome praise by Yang Ch'eng-wu. I attach brief extracts from the document (the original is being sent to Leslie Smith for full translation and copying) which give an idea of its flavour. The points to be made about this work seem to be that someone thought it was necessary to defend Lin Piao (and to stress that his health was good) and that Yang Ch'eng-wu, unless the document is a forgery, has pinned his colours still more firmly to Lin Piao's mast. The evidence about Lin's position is still inconclusive but the question mark still hovers over him.

11. Looking back over the past two months therefore we are faced with many puzzles. We cannot hope to solve them at this stage; all we can do is to draw attention to what appear to be the main mysteries. If we turn now to the present situation and the future role of the PLA there are signs that the strains on the PLA of its recent enforced interference in political affairs are beginning to tell. It is not yet coming apart at the seams but it is almost certainly much less responsive to central direction than hitherto. It is finding its new role, as the most important partner of the tripartite alliance, a very difficult one to play and one for which, by training, organisation and perhaps, in many cases, temperament, it is ill-equipped. With the decimation or demise of the Party apparatus, it must expect to have to carry a heavy administrative burden for some time to come. A force with a tradition that "the Party controls the Army and not the Army the Party" now finds the positions dramatically reversed.

12. A series of new relationships will have to be worked out in the future - between Mao and the Army leadership, the PLA and what is to replace the old Party and Government machines and, within the Army, between the Centre and the Regions. The purge will also have had its effect - upsetting what was no doubt an intricate pattern of personal relationships and leaving a new legacy of bitterness. It is really much too early to try to guess the pattern of the future but there must be changes from the old equations. One possible effect, for example, could be that the army will ultimately now be able to obtain greater professional freedom having shaken itself clear from political control.

FOREWORD

Lin Piao has been constantly and resolutely loyal to the thought of Mao Tse-tung. He has carried out an uncompromising struggle with all sorts of "leftist" rightist errors of line.

..... Since he took over the work of the Military Affairs Commission he has held high the banner of Mao's thought and creatively applied it .....

Speech by Yeh Chien-ying on 25 September, 1966 .....

"A happy event has recently occurred in our Party which should be celebrated, that is Chairman Mao has chosen his own number one successor. For several decades the Chairman has been seeking the man who will in the end succeed him. The experience of 40 years of revolutionary struggle has proved that Lin Piao is the richest in the experience of revolutionary struggle, is the greatest statesman and strategist and has the greatest qualities of leadership and is the best successor to Mao .....

To have the brilliant leadership of Chairman Mao and Comrade Lin Piao is just like Marx and Engels. With Chairman Mao and Comrade Lin our revolution will win victories everywhere ....."

On the 5th October, 1966, Yeh Chien-ying at the All Army Conference for mobilising the Cultural Revolution in military schools and academies, pointed out ..... "Among the party leadership

You enquired about evidence to support the ~~submissions~~ about the People's Liberation Army contained in paragraph 9 of this paper. The sort of evidence we had in mind for the "important differences" was the replacement of the Chief of Staff and the statement in an editorial of the 'Liberation Daily' of 1 August, 1966 that there had been "three great struggles" against representatives of the bourgeois military line, the last having taken place "not long ago". The reasons for the "renewed controversy" referred to were the decision to re-organise the Cultural Revolution group for the P.L.A. which was followed by increasing attacks on senior officers including venerable figures such as Marshals Ho Lung and Chu Teh. We assumed that some elements in the Army objected to the implicit criticism of its purity and the further emphasis on "politics first". These same "professionals" may also have objected to the later decision to throw in the Army in support of revolutionary groups.

2. There is no direct evidence of P.L.A. Commanders disobeying orders. But the situation in some areas is very confused; there have been reports of the Army preventing revolutionary groups from "seizing power" in Tibet, Sinkiang and Inner Mongolia. This may merely have meant that they were causing unrest and creating instability and that local Commanders decided to restore order and not that their fundamental loyalty to Mao or Lin Piao was affected.

ANGLO/AMERICAN DISCUSSIONS ON CHINA

Experts from the State Department and Foreign Office met in London on 6 and 7 February to discuss the situation in China, its possible outcome and implications for China's foreign policies. The following is a summary account of the views they expressed.

The Nature of the Cultural Revolution

2. It was generally agreed that among the important and decisive influences at work in the Cultural Revolution, the most important were:

- (a) sharp disagreement over economic policy ("Red" versus expert) in the context of the third five-year plan;
- (b) divergent views over foreign policy and methods for reversing the series of Chinese failures in 1965.
- (c) disagreement over the role of the P.L.A., in particular as related to China's fears that the Vietnam war might escalate to involve China; and
- (d) a struggle for power, linked with the possibility of Mao's losing effective control.

3. The British tended to place emphasis on the prophylactic nature of the campaign which they saw as the culmination of a series intended to prevent China succumbing to Soviet-type revisionism. In the course of this campaign, problems of policy and power had later become involved. The Americans held the view that differences over policy and power played a much more important part in precipitating the campaign.

The Leadership

4. It was agreed that Mao had played the leading part throughout the campaign, although he might have been ill or incapacitated in late 1965 and early 1966. He remained in control of his own faction and appeared to be exercising the main initiative in developing the campaign.

5. The Cultural Revolution as it developed led to the disgrace of a number of important leaders in the Politburo; among them Peng Chen (Mayor of Peking), Lo Jui-ch'ing (P.L.A. Chief of Staff), Liu Shao-ch'i (Chairman of the Republic), Teng Hsiao-p'ing (General Secretary of the Party) and T'ao Chu (Party Propaganda Chief).

6. Lin Piao appeared to have been designated as heir apparent to Mao, but there were doubts about whether he would be able to fulfil this role without the benefit of Mao's support.

Lin's strength was derived from the P.L.A. and not from the Party organisation in which he is not known to have strong support.

7. Chou En-lai (Prime Minister) had played a prominent role throughout the campaign, urging moderation at each successive stage. With the alienation of the Party apparatus, it was thought that the support of Chou En-lai and the Government apparatus was increasingly important to Mao.

/urging

The Opposition

8. It was agreed that there had been widespread and stubborn opposition to the campaign and to extreme Maoist policies. Much of this opposition had been centred in the Party apparatus which was resisting the campaign and obstructing its implementation. The opposition, however, appeared to lack either organised leadership or cohesion. The Americans tended to take a more serious view than the British of the nature and strength of the opposition in the Party in the bureaucracy and possibly in the army. We agreed that there was so much genuine confusion that it was difficult to know the real strength of the opposition.

People's Liberation Army (P.L.A.)

9. It was agreed that there had been and continued to be important differences within the P.L.A. The P.L.A. was now being used by the Mao/Lin group in an attempt to maintain order. This was in sharp contrast to the P.L.A.'s previous role and the change of policy may well have brought renewed controversy amongst the army leadership. It was /thought evidence for this?

But what is the evidence?

thought that the P.L.A. in general would probably remain loyal to orders from the Mao/Lin group, although in certain regions (e.g. the South West, Tibet, Sinkiang, Inner Mongolia and Fukien) P.L.A. commanders might support local Party officials opposed to this group. It was noted that in several areas the military commander and party secretary were the same person.

Is there any evidence of
PLA commanders
disobeying orders?

The Effect of the Cultural Revolution on the Chinese Economy

10. It was agreed that the damage done so far to the Chinese economy was impossible to quantify but it might be considerable. There had already been serious local disruption of transportation and interference with industrial production which must have delayed the implementation of programmes for economic development. Should the Cultural Revolution continue for a long period and be extended into the rural sector and further into the factories, the prospects for dislocation would be much more serious.

The Outcome of the Cultural Revolution

11. It was agreed that this was impossible to forecast. It clearly would not finally be resolved for some time and the present state of confusion would continue. It was believed that the formation of Paris-type communes was conceived by Mao as a means for establishing a new apparatus of central control. The British side tended to view the shorter-term prospects for the success of this aim more favourably than did the Americans.

/a new

12 Of the various possible outcomes, it was agreed that a durable victory for Maoist policies was unlikely. However the opposition had got to show that it had the power to overthrow the Mao/Lin group itself. At present the most likely outcome appeared to be a prolonged stalemate in which Mao's policies would be moderated and government administrators such as Chou En-lai would have an important role to play.

13. The possibility of civil war could not be ruled out but the British thought this to be unlikely. However an extended stalemate could foster the rise of regionalism. Another possibility was that the P.L.A., which had already assumed an important role, would take on administrative tasks where existing organs had become ineffective.

Foreign Policy

14. It was agreed that the Cultural Revolution was essentially inward-looking and that Chinese leaders would be preoccupied with internal problems for some time to come. This did not exclude the possibility of irrational action particularly in peripheral areas.

Increasing xenophobia could make China more sensitive to external events.

15. The Cultural Revolution had resulted in a very sharp deterioration in Sino/Soviet relations. Whatever its outcome, it was thought unlikely that there could now be any fundamental improvement in these relations. The emergence of a "revisionist" leadership in China could however result in some tactical rapprochement for economic and military reasons. But this seemed unlikely and certainly could not happen before Mao left the scene.

16. On Vietnam it was likely that the Chinese would continue to oppose any negotiated settlement other than on their own unacceptable terms. On the other hand, they were also likely to continue to avoid direct military involvement. Their present aid to North Vietnam was likely to continue despite internal disturbances. It was thought that China would not seek a change of status in Hong Kong. Hong Kong was however an area in which the irrational factor could be particularly important in determining China's response to any incident.

17. Irrespective of the outcome of the Cultural Revolution, China's attitude towards Formosa would not change. This would continue to be the decisive factor in China's relations with the United States.

18. On China's representation in the United Nations, it was thought that the excesses of the Cultural Revolution had largely contributed to the failure of Peking to obtain the China seat last year. Until the outcome of China's internal crisis became clearer, the British thought it was impossible to make any worthwhile forecast about Peking's prospects in the General Assembly's debate this coming Autumn. The American view was that an Albanian type resolution would have even less chance this year than last. The British thought that the emergence of a more moderate regime in China would much improve Peking's chances in obtaining the China seat. The Americans thought that, so long as the question of Formosan representation remained unsolved, even increased support for Peking would not secure the seat for them. They also considered that a renewal of the Study group proposal would reduce Peking's chances.

It was indeed surprising that the decision was taken to re-organise the P.L.A.'s Cultural Revolution Group when the Cultural Revolution appeared to be in troubled waters - an action which seemed to suggest that a mass purge operation would be conducted in the P.L.A. It is possible, however, that disagreements at the highest level at the centre, necessitated some action which needed to be explained away to the public and P.L.A. units. The struggle against Liu Chih-chien, Ho Lung and others named in paragraph 3 of Mr. Whitney's letter preceded the reorganisation of the Cultural Revolution Group and did not follow it as suggested in the letter - part of the reorganisation itself was the dismissal of Liu Chih-chien from his post as head of the Group in the P.L.A. The Liberation Army Daily editorial of 14 January was, moreover, curiously worded. It did not apparently call for a purge campaign throughout the forces, but only in limited sections - in academies, institutions and cultural bodies and in the "higher level leading organs". The public was aware of "revolutionary" activities in military academies in Peking and the reference would come as no surprise - it would be reasonable (and not seriously prejudicial to discipline) to conduct the cultural revolution in academic and some research bodies of the P.L.A. The editorial insisted on discipline and emphasised that there must be no "plucking out" in ordinary P.L.A. units. The announcement may, therefore, have been intended to limit the scope of cultural revolutionary activity in the P.L.A. while giving unavoidable intimation that there had been some trouble with people at the top in Peking. Since the announcement, there has been no evidence of an extensive purge in the armed forces.

2. In deciding that the P.L.A. should intervene in support of the "revolutionaries" in the mass movement (paragraph 6 of Mr. Whitney's letter) and that it should engage in administrative tasks, Mao and his supporters evidently recognised that a difficult situation had arisen in some provinces and that it was necessary to restore order and discipline as quickly as possible. In making this decision, they were probably influenced above all by their concern for the economic situation.

3. Although the Liberation Army Daily had implied that there was opposition to the decision for the P.L.A. to intervene, as far as one can judge from the latest reports, the P.L.A. seems to be standing up well to the additional strains placed upon it (paragraph 11 of Mr. Whitney's letter). With the possible exception of a few areas, notably the border regions of Sinkiang and Tibet, the armed forces have apparently remained responsive to central direction. We have now had several reports of Military Districts convening conferences with representatives of "revolutionary" cadres and masses on the subject of Spring farming. In holding these conferences, the local military commanders are clearly acting on instructions from the centre.

4. The leading rôle now being taken by the P.L.A. in administrative and economic affairs does give the impression that the P.L.A. is usurping civil authority. However, the use of the army in this way has its theoretical justification in Mao's view of a "people's army" and more immediately in the press expositions of the "three-way alliance". In future, whether or not the P.L.A. continues to take a leading rôle in administrative affairs will presumably depend on the development of the economic and political situation, but it seems likely that a form of "three-way alliance" (i.e. involving the P.L.A.) will be preserved in the new provincial Revolutionary Committees.

5. Despite the new responsibilities given to the P.L.A. there is no suggestion that its tradition of obedience to the Party has been discarded or that the P.L.A. has shaken off political control (paragraphs 11-12). In the past, the Chinese Communists have Party controls the P.L.A. through the latter's loyalty to the central Party leadership and through the system of Party Committees within the P.L.A. Throughout the leadership changes of 1966, the unity of political and military command has been preserved at the highest level of leadership, and there is little sign of any weakening of Party control within the P.L.A.

6. Nevertheless, as the civilian Party organisation has been undermined by the Cultural Revolution, the P.L.A. and the Party within it have obviously gained a larger share of authority. At present Mao and his followers appear to be using the P.L.A.'s chain of command to fill the gap left by the damaged Party and administrative machinery. I agree with Mr. Whitney (paragraph 12) that a series of new relationships have to be worked out, and this will doubtless entail problems of conflicting personal loyalties for many of those involved.

7. As regards Lin Piao's position (paragraph 10), I agree with Mr. Whitney's comments. In the last two months, the signs have been that Lin's name is to be retained as that of Mao's most trusted deputy. It may be speculated, however, that he will assume more of a figure-head rôle than in the previous period since August 1966.

Dear David,

In the light of the editorial from Red Flag No. 5 which laid down the ground rules for P.L.A. participation in take-overs, we have been looking again at Chang Jih-ch'ing's account in the People's Daily of 28 February, of how the Army took part in the Shansi seizure of power. There were excerpts in N.C.N.A. of 1 March.

2. Chang Jih-ch'ing began from the premise, which had already been hammered home in the official press, that there was no question of the Army standing to one side. The Army must intervene and the only problem was which side would it support. Some people argued that if the Army intervened this would weaken its stability. Chang rejected this argument on the grounds that the masses would immediately welcome the intervention so that the soldiers would have no need to threaten the Army's stability. Chang argued that only by bringing in the Army could the new organisations be given a "powerful leading core".

3. The way in which the Army intervened in Shansi was spelled out in some detail. The Army either took over critically important "proletarian dictatorship" units and State Planning Departments or sent small numbers of "control troops" (Chih Ching Pu Tui) who carried out 24 hour patrols in the area. The P.L.A. also took a direct part in the take-over of some units and sent armed forces to places where the opponents of the chosen "revolutionaries" were firmly entrenched, to assist the "revolutionaries" and "revolutionary" leading cadres in their seizure of power. In other important units where the revolutionaries had not acquired superiority of numbers the P.L.A. carried out a military take-over to ensure that production continued normally and to "prepare the conditions" for take-over by the right group. In places where the leadership had serious problems but where take-over was not necessary the P.L.A. sent representatives to help in the "reform" of the leading group. The Militia also played an active part in these manoeuvres. Apart from these examples of direct local intervention the P.L.A. also sent out propaganda teams to factories, schools, villages and on to the streets to proclaim that the P.L.A. were on the side of the "leftists" and to persuade the "counter-revolutionary" or "reactionary" organisations to disband.

4. In order to keep a firm grip on the situation the P.L.A. also took over the Provincial Public Security Bureau, Courts and Procurator's Office. A "Proletarian Dictatorship Committee" was set up composed of representatives from rebel organisations, "revolutionary" cadres from political and legal departments and the P.L.A. The new Committee took control over the Public Security Bureau, Courts and Procurator's Office and dealt with "counter-revolutionary" organisations and "bad elements".

5. We had wondered whether intervention by the P.L.A. would have any effect upon the reliability and unity of the local forces who would be obliged to suppress organisations with a claim to legitimacy at least equal to that of those on whose behalf the P.L.A. were acting. It is interesting that "some people" also voiced the same doubts, probably within the ranks of the P.L.A. itself. We have heard reports that the Army in Tibet is split between the more elderly officers who support Chang Kuo-hua and the younger men who perhaps want a less cautious and more activist policy in the Cultural Revolution. Certainly in Shansi the idea of Army intervention has been questioned, although it is by no means clear who Chang's opponents were. It is interesting that the Commander of the District (mentioned as late as January 1966) Ch'en Chin-yu has not been heard of since the take-over and it is tempting to ascribe these views to him. However, we have no definite evidence of this and Ch'en may have fallen into disgrace for other reasons (e.g. connections with figures under attack at the centre etc.).

6. The scale of P.L.A. intervention in the Shansi take-over was clearly very wide and ultimately decisive. The Army were quite prepared to send armed forces to places where the struggle had not swung in the way the Army side wanted and to intervene with sheer military force on behalf of minorities. At the same time they made every effort to warn people whose side they were on and reserved the right to oust anyone opposed to them. With the Public Security organs, Courts and Procurator's Office virtually under P.L.A. control it is evident that the Shansi seizure of power was almost entirely a military take-over in which the revolutionary rebels took only a supporting rôle. Chang's stress upon a "powerful leading core" shows that he was concerned more with restoring order than with letting the masses have their way.

7. I am copying this letter to G.E. Tozer (D.I.S.), F. Brewer (J.R.D.), Miss K.M. Draycott (J.I.R.D.), E.T. Davies (Hong Kong), L.C. Smith (Hong Kong) and B.T. Gilmore (Washington).

Dear David,

Until the last few weeks, little had been heard of the militia for some time. Now, with the Liberation Army Daily editorial of 16 March (NCNA and our telegram no. 300 of 17 March), it seems to have come firmly back into the Chinese scene.

2. The editorial makes it clear that the main reason for this re-emergence is that, where necessary, the militia is to form the military component of three-way alliances in (lower-level) departments and units where power must be seized. The militia must also follow the People's Liberation Army in assisting in the imposition of the dictatorship of the proletariat and in the support of the "broad masses of the left".

3. It is not surprising that the P.L.A., some of whose members have in earlier years been seen to harbour a number of doubts about the practical value of the militia, is now glad of its help. The Army is now carrying an extraordinary burden which increases almost daily, the latest addition being the call to "support" the work of industrial production contained in the Central Committee letter of 18 March (NCNA 19 March and our telegram no. 308 of 20 March). It clearly seems to be impossible for the P.L.A. to be effectively represented in all areas and organisations where current doctrine requires a military presence, and the answer must therefore be to rely on the militia.

4. This raises the important questions of who controls the militia and how. Until the Cultural Revolution, it was generally recognised that, although the P.L.A. had obvious responsibilities for the training, supply and use of the militia, final control rested with the Party organisation at each level. Now, the increasing role of the Army, particularly in the provinces, has made organisational adjustments necessary. Army control of the militia seems to have been strengthened and correspondingly Party control eroded.

5. It appears that the newly strengthened links between the P.L.A. and the militia are to be maintained by means of "People's Armed Forces Departments at all levels" (see, for example, the broadcast from Sian Radio on 16 February - "News from Chinese Provincial Radio Station No. 195", p.6.). These Departments, according to Kiangsi Radio, work under the Provincial Military Districts (China News Summary No. 159 of 2 March, p.2.). Presumably the staffing of these Departments has put yet more demands on the hard-pressed corps of officers of the P.L.A. After the disturbances of recent months, the Departments must face many difficult problems in weeding out from the militia those elements now regarded as unreliable. In most cases the leaders of the local militia were presumably those cadres who have been most heavily criticised.

6. We shall be on the look out for more references to the People's Armed Forces Departments, and would welcome any information on them from you or other recipients of this letter.

7. I am copying this letter to Emrys Davies and Leslie Smith in (2) Hong Kong, Brian Gilmore in Washington (2), Eric Tozer, D.I.S., Frank Brewer, J.R.D., and Colin Wilson, J.I.R.D.

Mr. Wilson (F.E.I.) (10/11)

We do not think the "People's Armed Forces Departments" are new. There are references to them in past years. We cannot say from our records precisely how these Departments fit into the administrative machine. All the references we have seen are to "County and Municipal People's Armed Forces Departments." Their functions, we think, are to co-ordinate ~~and~~ action ~~the~~ between the P.L.A. and Civil authorities, but we cannot say <sup>whether</sup> (where) they are themselves civil departments or county/municipal departments of the P.L.A. They may be staffed by representatives of both civil & military.

2. We will keep a look out for information which will help to clarify the status of these Departments.
3. We agree with Mr. Whitely that reports from several provinces suggest that the P.L.A. has increased its control over the militia. There is some doubt about the extent of civilian Party control over the militia. The provisional regulations for the Shensi Revolutionary Committee, adopted on 18 March (SWTB III of 21 March) state

"The Militia Mobilisation Dept. (of the Shensi Revolutionary Committee) is mainly responsible for military training work in various revolutionary organisations. It is responsible for organising military manpower, helping and educating rehabilitated army men, sponsoring people's air defence and national defence work, and helping the

The Provincial Military District carry out

The functions of this Dept. seem to be wider

An interesting story
The Designer
Dear David,
W.C. Scher
20/iv

The Chinese press has been carrying a large number of reports recently of P.L.A. units going into factories all over China to help the workers "grasp revolution and promote production". The Central Committee letter of 18 March to cadres, workers and staff in mines and factories revealed that the Central Committee had formally authorised the despatch of troops to factories although in many areas groups of soldiers had already been going into industrial enterprises for some time. It is perhaps worth saying a brief word about what the soldiers have apparently been doing once they moved into the factories.

2. We have had an eye-witness account of what happened in a Canton factory when the P.L.A. arrived. David Oancia, the Toronto Globe and Mail correspondent, happened to be in Canton visiting a chemical factory early in March. The People's Daily of 12 March reported that the local military commands in Peking, Shenyang, Tsinan, Foochow and Canton were sending troops to various factories at that time. In fact as the manager was showing Oancia round the sound of drums and gongs was heard and a P.L.A. propaganda truck roared into the yard. The workers immediately downed tools to welcome them. Oancia asked the manager what the P.L.A. were expected to do and how long they would stay. The manager was obviously taken completely by surprise at the arrival of the P.L.A. and could only answer that whatever they did he welcomed them anyway. In the event they stayed for half a day which was spent in calling meetings to read Mao quotations and harangue the workers about not wasting time and sticking to their posts. The workers gladly took the rest of the day off to listen to them. In the evening the soldiers jumped into their truck and clattered off again.

3. In Shanghai, Kweichow, Heilungkiang, Shantung, Shenyang and the Tuk'ou area of Szechwan the P.L.A. had begun to send units into factories from the third week in February onwards. This is almost a month before the Central Committee decision was revealed in the letter to mines and factories. In Shansi the Army took over certain key industrial points such as the railways, power stations and water works as early as the middle of January when the initial seizure of power had been completed (People's Daily 29 March). Two months later, in early March, troops were sent to important industrial enterprises such as steel works, national defence industries and communications and telegraphic installations. At the same time representatives from the Armed Forces Department (perhaps including militia members) were also despatched to various other factories. In Shenyang no less than 2,000 army political workers were sent into the 160 factories in the city. The soldiers toured the workshops, canteens and hostels and in some cases took up residence there and laboured alongside the workers.

4. The Liberation Army Daily editorial of 22 March (People's Daily of the same day) laid down the general rules for the P.L.A. in the factories. The soldiers were first and foremost sent to propagate Mao's thought and to do political and ideological work. They must study the local situation within each factory and make full enquiries about the different workers' groups before taking any direct action. The general sense of the editorial was that wherever possible the Army should avoid trouble and should rely on propaganda and persuasion. The P.L.A. were obviously under pressure in some places to arbitrate between different factions and sometimes to take over a factory on behalf of one of the groups. In Shanghai some of the propaganda teams appear to have yielded to the temptation to lay the law down. Their main task was clearly to get production going again and to restore normal working discipline. In many instances they were called on to stimulate workers and cadres to form new "leading groups". This often entailed taking the side of cadres who had been subjected to rough treatment at an earlier stage in the movement and who were naturally unwilling to expose themselves to more trouble. In some factories there was still a good deal of anarchism and factionalism and it must have required all the prestige of the P.L.A. to restore normal production. On the other hand, it was obviously impossible for the P.L.A. to rely on propaganda alone in all cases. Some "reactionary" organisations were suppressed and an article in the People's Daily of 11 April suggested that in some cases the P.L.A. set about disbanding various groups by force almost as soon as they arrived. The articles of course say nothing of the Army being obliged to take action against recalcitrant workers refusing to go back to work. This must also have happened.

5. The decision to launch the P.L.A. into the factories cannot have been an easy one. To some extent the leadership's hand had been forced since many local military commanders had already sent the Army into industry before the Central Committee letter was published. Nevertheless all the widespread activity now being undertaken by the P.L.A. must place a strain even on its vast manpower resources. Large numbers of soldiers have been despatched to the countryside and others have been sent to schools to drill the children. The Army is already carrying out many of the normal administrative tasks usually done by the Party and Government network. The decision to send the soldiers into the factories must also have placed many local commanders in an acute dilemma between obeying one set of directives to restore order in the factories and another set to be circumspect with the revolutionary rebels. The account of the propaganda teams in Shanghai (People's Daily of 11 April) shows that in a lot of cases order came before revolution.

6. I am copying this letter to F. Brewer (J.R.D.), Miss K.M. Draycott (J.I.R.D.), E.T. Davies and L.C. Smith (Hong Kong) and B.T. Gilmore (Washington).

Dear David,

Cultural Revolution

Since I have not seen them drawn to attention elsewhere, I might perhaps mention two small points which have interested the State Department recently and might therefore interest you.

2. The first was that they picked up a reference at the end of June (I do not, I am afraid, have the details to hand) to a "congress" or "conference" of the P.L.A. to be held next summer. Donald was interested in this for the novelty both of what appeared to be a sort of public rally of the P.L.A., and also of the Chinese announcing any major function in advance.

3. The second was a reference in the Shanghai Wen Hui Pao of 30 March (just come to light) to the fact that it was to be printed also in Chengtu for distribution in Szechwan and Tibet.

4. I am sending a copy of this letter to Whitney in Peking.

Addressed to Foreign Office telegram No. 989 of 1 August. Repeated for information to Washington, POLAD Singapore and Saving to Moscow and Hong Kong.

People's Daily of 31 July carries Red Flag editorial entitled "The Proletariat must take a firm hold of the gun". Main points are as follows.

2. The people cannot liberate themselves if they do not take hold of the gun and do not use revolutionary arms to oppose counter revolutionary arms. The greatest crime of the revisionists, such as Khrushchev, Thorez, Togliatti, Dange and Namboodiripad, is that they are opposed to the people waging armed struggle, the Chinese top person taking the capitalist road has also opposed armed struggle and called for the parliamentary road. However, in many parts of Asia, Africa and Latin America, revolutionary people are driving out their opportunist leaders by waging armed struggles.

3. In striving for restoration the bourgeoisie seeks to control the Army. Therefore it is imperative that the proletariat take a firm hold of the gun and keep firm hold of the Army. Peng Teh-huai and Lo Jui-ching were the agents within the Army of the top party person who is the general representative in the forces seeking capitalist restoration and was ringleader of the anti-party bloc exposed at the Lushan Conference. Peng and Lo opposed Mao's thought and tried to turn the PLA into a bourgeois army. Instead of putting politics first they peddled revisionist trash abroad and gave priority military technique over political and ideological work. Peng and Lo maintained illicit relations with foreign countries and carried out conspiracies to usurp control of the party and the Army. Lo formed an anti-party conspiratorial clique in collusion with P'eng Chen, Lu Ting-yi and Yang Shang-kun.

4. However, Lin Piao has made outstanding contributions in the struggle to make the PLA a highly proletarianised and militant revolutionary army. In order to prevent the restoration of capitalism Lin Piao laid particular emphasis on ideological struggle and the proletariat's control of the armed forces. The PLA have made great contributions during the Cultural Revolution in supporting the Left, in industry and agriculture, and in the work of military control and military-political training, the further strengthening of army civilian unity is an important guarantee for the complete victory of the Cultural Revolution.

/5. In some places

5. In some places there are some responsible people in local garrisons who in the work of supporting the Left have committed errors which are sometimes errors of direction and line. So long as they realize their errors, confess them and correct them, it is still a problem of awareness and they will meet with understanding and support from the masses. But if these people stubbornly refuse to correct the errors, then it is not a question of awareness and the essential nature of the errors will change. Those responsible people in local garrisons who have shortcomings or errors in their work of supporting the Left must be helped to change. Contradictions between troops and the revolutionary masses must be handled strictly in accordance with the principles of internal contradictions among the people, and not as antagonistic contradictions.

6. Points in my paragraph 5 above are not in N.C.N.A. translation.

7. Same paper carries supporting editorial of its own and another from Liberation Army Daily. Acting Chief of General Staff Yang Chen-wu used the same themes in his speech at Army Day banquet last night.

2. I had not previously heard that the Wen Hui Pao was printed also in Chengtu. I suppose the reason must be that the paper has now achieved nation-wide stature as a sound "revolutionary" organ. You probably remember that Mao gave his personal blessing to the "take over" of the paper in January and just recently it does seem to have had the edge on the Peoples Daily for revolutionary fervour. Interestingly enough, the Wen Hui Pao, unlike the other Shanghai paper Liberation Daily, can be obtained on subscription in Peking.

Addressed to Hong Kong telegram No. 719 of 15 August.
Repeated for information to Foreign Office, Washington and

Not Recd — Wilford's letter to me of 6 August (not to all).

Position of Huang Yung-sheng: Commander Canton Military Region.

We suspect that Huang is too concerned with reimposing order in Kwangtung and restoring unity among the rival factions in revolutionary organisations and probably within the PLA itself to have time to play a very active role in regard to Hong Kong. His own position seems far from secure. He is under sustained poster criticism in Canton and the Peking leadership are likely to be dissatisfied with his achievements in the military region (Kwangtung, Kwangsi, Hunan). His appearance at the Army Day celebrations here cannot be conclusive evidence of his loyalty to and standing with Peking. It is worth noting that a number of figures who attended are in serious trouble, e.g. T'an Chen-lin and Hsu Hsiang-ch'ien, and that following the Wuhan episode the Maoists badly needed to put on display as many military commanders as possible.

2. It seems likely therefore that hotheads in the border villages or in Canton will continue to have considerable freedom for independent initiatives over Hong Kong.

Foreign Office please pass Washington 500.

16 August, 1967.

Dear David,

The Chinese press has always been very careful not to reveal the official numbers of Army units mentioned in newspaper accounts. It was therefore all the more surprising to find that the People's Daily of 12 and 14 August, in describing reactions to Lin Piao's letter to Peking Mao-study activists and to the establishment of the Tsinghai Revolutionary Committee, referred to a number of Army units as having derived encouragement from the news. The references included the unit numbers and in some cases the areas where they were operating. I have made a list of these numbers, together with the appropriate areas (where they have been given) and have included it as an appendix to the letter.

2. We have been wondering why the press has departed from precedent in revealing so many unit numbers. We have noticed from time to time that various Red Guard newspapers have leaked unit numbers in their reports but we have generally put this down to careless security on their part. The present example is quite different. In view of the numbers of units stationed in each area it would be hazardous to suggest that only those units which were mentioned have been found worthy of official approval and the rest have proved unsatisfactory in the present campaign. This would indicate an extremely serious situation which we do not consider has so far been reached. At the same time, one possible explanation may be that confusion is so widespread among the units in each area about how to discharge their duties in the Cultural Revolution, that it has become necessary for the Army leadership to nominate various units whose actions have been defined as absolutely correct. If this is the case, then all other units would be expected to fall in with their views on past disputes and on the future conduct of the campaign. The situation would therefore be somewhat analogous to the confusion among various civilian rebel groups like, for example, those in Honan, where the "7 February Commune" has been repeatedly sponsored in the official press. The test now for true revolutionaries in Honan is whether or not they support the 7 February commune.

3. If this explanation is correct then the processes of establishing which Army unit is truly revolutionary have been taken out of the hands of the Local Commander and has been taken over by the centre. In view of the open split which has occurred in the Army leadership at the centre, where Hsiao Hua and the General Political Department are under heavy poster attack, this apparent confusion in the Provinces places the position of the Army as a whole in a very grave light. Bearing in mind the serious implications of all this, we should be particularly grateful for the comments of the military experts. The area in which these units have been operating is the most sensitive one in the whole of the country at present. The Provinces mentioned, apart from Kirin in the North-East, form a solid block in the centre of China. Since the Wuhan "Million Heroes" seem to be still active according to provincial newspapers, any confusion among the Army commands in that area becomes even more significant.

We agree with Mr. Applegard's suggested explanation that it has become necessary to nominate units whose actions & are considered to have been correct so that other units should deal with problems in a similar way. It is, however, still difficult to see which central group makes the decision. Could it be the Cultural Revolution Group in the PLA?

2. SWB III, 25/8 page B10 gives a Chekiang provincial broadcast in which two unit numbers are quoted. One of these "6517" was included in the People's Daily, issues seen by Mr. Applegard. We do not know whether the other has appeared in & central publicity. Presumably unit numbers are published only where some central body (or "inspectors" from the centre) have given its blessing. If not, there could be more confusion.

Dear David,

You will have noticed the very long article by Yang Ch'eng-wu, the Acting Chief of Staff of the People's Liberation Army, entitled "Establish in a thorough-going way the absolute authority of our great supreme commander Chairman Mao and of his great thought" which was carried in all the Peking papers on 3 November. It was translated in full in the N.C.N.A. bulletin of 4 November (item No. 110309), covering fourteen pages.

2. Judging by the prominence given to the article, its length and the fact that it was written by Yang Ch'eng-wu, who, as far as we can recall, has never produced anything on this scale before, it was clearly meant to be a document of some importance. The difficulty is to discover precisely where its significance lies. During the past week we have shopped around for the views of a number of our colleagues without receiving much enlightenment. All are agreed that it is important but none is able to say why. I offer you here a few of our own thoughts with due warning about their speculative nature.

3. Taking the article at face value, Yang is making a violent attack on Lo Jui-ch'ing, his predecessor as Chief of Staff of the People's Liberation Army and in the usual terms - the debate between politics first and military first. Lo is accused of opposing Mao's military theories, for example on "army building" (chien chün), on establishing the people's militia on a solid basis "organisationally, politically and militarily", on people's war and on the concept of "active defence". He is said to have opposed Mao since as long ago as the time of the Second Revolutionary Civil War, to have sought in various ways to have prevented the spread of Mao's thought and to have ordered the study of Liu Shao-chi's works throughout the Army. He is also accused of putting forward his "theory of non-conformity with the State" (pu ho kuo-t'i). The precise content of this theory is not spelt out but the implication seems to be that Lo tried to keep the P.L.A. isolated from the rest of Chinese society.

4. One possible aim of the article could be to concentrate any fire which is being directed against the P.L.A. on to Lo Jui-ch'ing and perhaps a small group which could be shown to have links with him. This would be in line with what is happening to cadres in the Party as a whole. The great majority are now declared good and worthy of salvation whilst criticism is directed at only the "very small handful". After the stresses on the P.L.A. in the last few months, and given the Maoists' dependence on the military in the present situation, it would be a logical move for them to try to make their peace with as many army cadres as possible. It is worth noting here that the reappearance of Yeh Chien-ying and Hsu Hsiang-ch'ien for the 1 October celebrations and the rally on 6 November, after weeks or months in limbo, may be an indication of this trend. However, there is no doubt that the shake-up in the P.L.A. reached quite serious proportions and the total absence of references to Hsiao Hua and his General Political Department suggests that it is far from over. This impression was reinforced by the Liberation Army Daily editorial of 9 November (our telegram No. 230) on the need to carry out the work of "education about the present situation" which ended with a call to the Army to do still better in following Mao's line. Another purpose of the article, therefore, is no doubt to provide further ammunition to be used against the rump of incorrigibles. Yet for such a lengthy tract it has only very little to say on the great military debate, and nothing in this field that has not been said before, and ~~that~~ one must conclude that there are other objectives in view.

5. One of these would seem to be to give a boost to the position and the achievements of Lin Piao. Throughout the article Yang pours sickening adulation on the head of his immediate superior and presumed benefactor, portraying him as the one man who has consistently and heroically defended the authority of Mao's thought and of Mao himself against all assaults of the heathen. This again is in line with other indications of a campaign to improve Lin's standing, such as his speech to the rally on 6 November (our telegram No. 224).

6. The suspicion lingers that there may be yet another objective, although here one ventures further into the realms of speculation. Lo Jui-ch'ing and Liu Shao-ch'i are shown as people who have dared to launch direct attacks on Mao himself. Liu is said to have demanded, in 1964, that Mao should "abdicate" and Lo to have made numerous attacks on the "cult of personality". It is interesting to note that similar charges were made against Lu Ting-i in another long article by Chung Hsüan-tsao in the People's Daily on 9 November. Could it be that these things are being said again after eighteen months of the Cultural Revolution? The article also recalls a number of earlier attacks on Marxism-Leninism which could well be relevant today; it was, for example, described as "prejudice and empty talk which does not fit reality". Hu Shih is brought to task for opposing Marxism with his call to "study more problems and talk less 'isms'".

7. The article rebuts these implied charges with praise of Mao which is so nauseating that one is tempted to the belief that it is deliberately produced by his enemies in order to bring him into ridicule ("a genius of the calibre of Chairman Mao appears in the world only once in hundreds of years" etc). Whilst this is always a possibility it seems however much more likely that the Chinese are able to produce this sort of thing simply because they have lost all sense of proportion. Yang makes the usual catalogue of claims for Mao's achievements - some more credible than others. We are yet again reminded of the hydrogen bomb and the guided missile and told of the "continuous leaps forward in industry and bumper harvests year after year" and that the masses have never before been in such high spirits. There are also a number of references to the need for a strong leader and the authority of Lenin and of Marxist mythology is invoked to prove this point ("Marxists have always placed great weight on the individual genius of proletarian leaders, regarding it as an important aspect to be considered in choosing leaders"). These are backed up with dire warnings of what might befall if Mao and his thought do not remain supreme - "the fruits of our revolution.. might all be lost overnight". In evaluating these points Yang is not only defending Mao and his thought; he is also defending Lin, whose position and chances to the succession are closely linked with the supremacy of the thought of the master.

8. One would not wish to appear to be too sensational and to be suggesting that Mao is about to be toppled in some sort of palace revolution. Nothing that we have seen so far amounts to concrete evidence which would justify such a view. However, there does seem to be a well-justified anxiety on the part of the leadership about the pass to which China has been brought as a result of their performance over the past year and more. This is underlined for example, by the latest campaign to persuade the Chinese people of the correctness of Mao's "recent directive" in which he tells them that the situation is "not just fairly good but excellent" (our telegram No. 230). It is very likely that many Chinese both in the P.L.A. and in the country as a whole have doubts about this statement and possibly some about the man who made it.

I am sending copies of this letter to Roy Spendlove in Washington and to Emrys Davies in Hong Kong.

Yours ever,

I agree with <sup>you</sup> ~~Ray Whitney's~~ view of the Yang Ch'eng-wu article. The recent spate of criticism of various leaders and policies must have led to widespread confusion in the P.L.A. as in other sections of the community. Many officials and military officers may have begun to think that the best hope of restoring normality to China lay in Mao and Lin stepping into the background. Yang's article seems to reflect the leaders' anxiety over such attitudes. At the same time, it is probably designed to counteract speculation at the lower levels that recent moves to slow down the Cultural Revolution might be taken as a sign that Mao and Lin were no longer in overall control.

3. It is also interesting that Yang discusses at great length Lo Jui-ch'ing's alleged opposition to Mao, but says very little about disagreements over practical policy for the P.L.A. This suggests that the leaders wish to limit both the targets and the subjects discussed in the criticism campaign, especially as regards the P.L.A.

it from other sources.

1/2 copy of usual r.m.d.

Don David,

There are increasing indications of trouble between the central leadership and the People's Liberation Army.

2. The most serious manifestation seems to have been the recent events in Fukien. Unfortunately, because of what appears to be a determined attempt by the Chinese authorities to suppress reports on the situation in the province, we have no information to add to that reported in our telegram No. 355 of 18 December but it is fairly certain that much of the trouble there has been caused by some of the units in the Foochow Military Region coming out in opposition to Mao. This suggests that the Fukien affair could be as serious for the Maoists as the incidents in Wuhan in July.

3. Han Hsien-ch'u, who is believed to have replaced Yeh Fei as Commander of the Military Region last year, is one of the group of senior regional officers, which you referred to in your letter FC 1/5 of 29 November, who appear to have stayed in Peking for some months. Posters criticising Han have recently appeared and there are rumours that he is opposed to Maoist policies. (It is possible that his agent in Fukien was one Huang Kuo-chang (7806/0344/6134) whom I have seen denounced in one or two posters as a "traitor". The only record we have of Huang is that he was a Fukien delegate to the National People's Congress in 1965 but Research Department may have more information about him.) According to some of the East Europeans here, the primary motive for Han Hsien-ch'u and the other military commanders remaining in Peking is not so much because they wished to stay here until the storm of Red Guard criticism in their own areas had abated, as you speculated in paragraph 4 of your letter, but rather because their loyalty to Mao was suspect and they were being subjected to "education". It is, of course, possible that both explanations are correct, the extent to which one explanation is more valid than the other depending on the individual concerned. Huang Yung-sheng, for example, has recently returned to Canton, where he was earlier under severe criticism by Red Guards, and so presumably now has the approval and the backing of Peking.

4. The thesis of our bloc colleagues is supported by the recent spate of articles on the PLA in the Chinese press. In my letter of 12 December I discussed the treatment of the heroic deeds of No. 4 Platoon of 6011 Pu Tui, which seemed intended, inter alia, to stimulate the rest of the armed forces into carrying out to the letter all Mao's directives, and to display direct personal loyalty to him. On 12 December the People's Daily and Liberation Army Daily launched yet another campaign which centred on what was said to be one of Mao's most recent instructions: "Fighters (i.e. soldiers) should be included in the study courses sponsored by the Army". It was obvious that a message of some considerable significance lay behind this seemingly innocuous injunction. One possibility was that this was simply intended, yet again, to hold the Army up to the nation as a model to be followed - that the aim was to ensure that the broad masses became still further involved in Mao study. The subsequent press campaign soon revealed that the objective was quite otherwise, nearer to home and more pointed. All the follow-up articles carried a heavy implication that PLA officers and cadres had become far too divorced from the mass of soldiers (a theme which has recurred at quite regular intervals since Liberation). As the editorial accompanying the first publication of the slogan in the People's Daily and Liberation Army Daily of 12 December said with surprising bluntness:-

"For our Army to be able to play a greater role in the Cultural Revolution, it must take Mao Tse-tung's Thought as its guide and improve the relations between higher and lower levels and between cadres and masses".

The criticism of the PLA contained in the articles was all the more striking because it was accompanied by virtually none of the usual fulsome praise.

5. These implications of such serious shortcomings in an Army which had allegedly "since Lin Piao took over the work of the Military Affairs Committee" been the exemplar of revolutionary enthusiasm and Mao's predominance, were reinforced by many calls to "greatly establish" ("ta shu t'eh shu") the authority of Mao and his Thought. It is perhaps even more significant that Peking posters have called for Lin Piao's authority also to be "greatly established" and it is fairly certain that one of the major aims of these campaigns is in fact to establish Lin's own position in the Army. Contrary to earlier claims, it is now implied that there are many sections of the forces where these tasks have yet to be accomplished. Apparently the thinking of many army cadres needs to be "revolutionised" and they are urged to do this by becoming the pupils of the masses.

6. Another article of interest and relevance appeared in the People's Daily of 15 December. This told of the adventures of the Party Committee (N.B.) of 4411 Pu Tui, a naval unit operating patrol boats, which since 1963 ("the turning point") has waged a campaign on behalf of the Mao-Lin line and against the bourgeois militarist line of China's Krushchev and his agent Lo Jui-ch'ing. The Committee had had to endure many vicissitudes and when it disobeyed the various "black directives", which subordinated political requirements to military ones, it was condemned for its "crimes". Nevertheless, as in all good fairy stories, virtue triumphed in the end and the Committee's steadfast loyalty to Mao and Lin and opposition to orders from the military hierarchy was vindicated.

7. It now seems possible to draw together the threads of these various campaigns - the calls for direct personal loyalty to Mao (and, by implication, Lin) and obedience to all their instructions, the reproof of the military cadres and warning that they must learn from the soldiers and emulate the latter's devotion to the Chairman and the hint that unit leaders and Party Committees should oppose instructions they receive which are not in accordance with Mao's line. It appears to be an attempt to secure the Army for the Mao-Lin side by winning over the mass of soldiers and lower echelons, thus bringing very strong pressure to bear on to those military commanders and middle-level cadres who are either hostile or unco-operative but who could not be removed without the most serious consequences.

8. It is tempting, although, given the paucity of information available to us, perhaps not particularly rewarding, to speculate on how the military establishment divides on this issue. We must certainly assume that Lin Piao remains firmly linked to Mao, although perhaps even he at times asks his master to relieve some of the pressures which are now on the PLA. Yang Ch'eng-wu is on the same bandwagon and there are no signs that he wants to get off. Then there is Wu Fa-hsien, who, judging by the appearances he has made in recent months may well have taken over Hsiao Hua's responsibilities as Director of the General Political Department or from Hsu Hsiang-ch'ien as Head of the Cultural Revolution Group of the PLA. Some East Europeans are inclined to cast Liu Po-ch'eng, "the One-eyed Dragon" who has not appeared in public for some time, in the role of leader of the opposition. They claim that Liu, who is now 76, has always been a determined foe of Lin Piao. It seems quite likely that supporting him would be the majority of the Chinese military establishment, including the old Marshals, such as Ho Lung, Yeh Chien-ying and Hsu Hsiang-ch'ien and the present military regional commanders which we have noted as being in Peking.

9. As I have said, this sort of assessment is highly speculative but what is clear beyond all reasonable doubt is that this is a critical period in the relationship between Mao and the military. If the latest campaigns do not achieve the desired response among the soldiers, Mao and Lin may well not be able to dragoon the generals into providing the assistance that they need so badly in their current efforts to restore control in China. The odds seem to be that the campaigns will not in fact succeed. One suspects that the great majority of both soldiers and officers are likely to be seriously discontented with the present state of affairs and probably with the leadership that produced it. As the only cohesive force left in the state, the PLA is burdened with running everything from provincial committees to primary schools, it is faced with a mighty task of maintaining internal security and is subject to frequent criticism and even physical attack for "meddling" (see page 1 of People's Daily of 17 November) in the affairs of revolutionary groups. The probability is that, unless they are prepared for very serious consequences for themselves if not for the Chinese state, the Maoists will have to bring themselves to accept a compromise with the generals.

MR. WHITNEY'S LETTER OF 19 DECEMBER, 1967.

You may wish to reply as follows to the personality questions raised in paragraph 3:-

A/ Joint Research Department have no recent information on Huang Kuo-chang (7806/0948/3864 - not 7806/0344/6134). He is not known to have served in the P.L.A. He appeared as a Secretary of the Foochow Municipal Party Committee in 1956.

J.R.D. think that one of the main reasons for the presence of Regional and District military leaders in Peking may be so that they are on call to take part in discussions with revolutionary groups from their areas. We have seen several reports of discussions being held in Peking between provincial revolutionary groups. Such discussions appear to have been taking place under the general supervision of Chou En-lai with the purpose of forming "revolutionary alliances" between the contending factions. J.R.D. agree, nevertheless, that there have recently been some hints of new strains in relations between Mao and his closest supporters on the one hand and sections of the P.L.A. leadership on the other. It is interesting that the P.L.A. have recently been reminded that they should "support the Left, but not any particular faction" - this implies that military Commanders are not allowed to take a strong line in attempting to put an end to conflicts among revolutionary groups.

Thank you for your letter of 19 December about the People's Liberation Army.

2. You enquired in your third paragraph about Huang Kuo-chang. Joint Research Department have no recent information on Huang Kuo-chang (7806/0948/3864 - not 7806/0344/6134). He is not known to have served in the P.L.A. He appeared as a Secretary of the Foochow Municipal Party Committee in 1956.

J.R.D. think that one of the main reasons for the presence of Regional and District military leaders in Peking may be so that they are on call to take part in discussions with revolutionary groups from their areas. We have seen several reports of discussions being held in Peking between provincial revolutionary groups. Such discussions appear to have been taking place under the general supervision of Chou En-lai with the purpose of forming "revolutionary alliances" between the contending factions. J.R.D. agree, nevertheless, that there have recently been some hints of new strains in relations between Mao and his closest supporters on the one hand and sections of the P.L.A. leadership on the other. It is interesting that the P.L.A. have recently been reminded that they should "support the Left, but not any particular faction" - this implies that military Commanders are not allowed to take a strong line in attempting to put an end to conflicts among revolutionary groups.

CHINA: THE ARMY AND THE NATION IN THE PRESENT PHASE OF THE
CULTURAL REVOLUTION

I. The need for providing the Army with clear guidance as to the courses of action that were both permissible and desirable in the conduct of the Cultural Revolution must have become singularly apparent to the leadership in Peking after the Wuhan Incident of late July, when two key members of Central Cultural Revolution Group were kidnapped by 'counter-revolutionaries' with Army support. This event revealed the strains under which the Army had been operating since its first projection into the struggles of the Cultural Revolution in January; and the premium that had been placed upon Army loyalty by the ambiguous and contradictory nature of official instructions. On the one hand the Army was required to support the 'genuine' Left, but on the other was forbidden to open fire on revolutionary organizations of any affiliation, even if military establishments were to be broken into and arms seized. <sup>(April 67)</sup> Moreover, revolutionary organizations were not to be suppressed without the permission of the Central Committee and even an arrest required proof that the suspect was a counter-revolutionary. These restraints were intended to appease the Left, who had made frequent complaint that the Army had supported their opponents. Identification of the 'genuine' Left among the numerous revolutionary factions must often have been difficult and so mistakes could have occurred, nevertheless the Army has acted above all in the interests of law and order without distinction as to alignment. After the Wuhan Incident, Left extremists made sharp inditement of the Army's conduct and demanded that the 'small handful in the Army taking the capitalist road' be plucked out, thereby presenting a potentially serious threat to the Army's internal cohesion.

2. An attempt had been made to conduct the Cultural Revolution by more peaceful methods in June, on the pretext that contradictions among the People are not mutually antagonistic. Violent struggle was forbidden; and the Army was charged with the responsibility for enforcing law and order, but by this time the Army had already begun to remain aloof and to avoid embroilment in the uncertainties of the general situation. It was not until 9th August that a more definitive guidance was provided, though rather within the context of preventing another Wuhan Incident through a firmer central control than of a move toward alleviating the Army's position. Lin Piao, in his address to senior officers on that day, apart from giving new emphasis to the familiar theme of 'supporting the Army and cherishing the People', merely required that all local decisions be in future referred to Peking for approval. It was not until late August that really positive steps were taken in the Army's favour: when Mao personally commended the 'support the Army' campaign; and when a directive was issued that all arms taken from the Army illegally must be handed in.

3. The change in official policy in the conduct of the Cultural Revolution became abundantly clear at the beginning of September, when on 1st and 5th Chiang Ching (Mao's wife) made speeches appealing for an end to factional strife through the forming of alliances; and inveighed against the disruptive activities of the extreme Left. Attempts to make trouble in the Army were described as like that of tearing down the Great Wall. On 5th September, also, the Army at length received a clear directive to fire-for-effect in a last resort, where persuasion had failed. The Army had thus received a mandate for its self-protection, but was still required to exercise patience and forbearance.

4. The level of factional strife decreased in September, but has since increased again, though not to the same earlier intensities. Disruptions to railway movement, caused by factionalism, were evidently sufficiently serious at the beginning of December, after the Autumn harvest, for Mao to issue a general order against pillage and sabotage. The occasion of the New Year was taken as opportunity to summon certain Army leaders to Peking for consultations - a method of personal diplomacy to which Mao has increasingly resorted; and to issue a new appeal to the nation for unity. The reference to Party-building suggests that its restoration is increasingly regarded as the fundamental solution to present difficulties. Tribute was paid to the 'tremendous contribution' the Army had made to the Cultural Revolution; and it was declared that in the struggle to win 'all-round victory', now beginning, the Army would undertake 'still further tasks of yet greater importance'.

5. The atmosphere of 'criticism and repudiation', that was given further sanction in the New Year message, is not however conducive to a re-emergence of stability and confidence, and must be a continuing factor in dissuading displaced Party officials from coming forward for reinstatement. The reconstruction of the Party is likely to be

be a slow process and must await implementation of the Revolutionary Committee system in depth as the framework upon which Party authority can rest. This task is being energetically pursued; and the achieving of Revolutionary Committees is gathering momentum in central provinces, but progress remains slow to non-existent in western and in eastern areas, where factionalism apparently still continues recalcitrant. The drought conditions of eastern areas must also inhibit the will to resolve differences. Three Provincial Revolutionary Committees were formed in January, including a Municipal Revolutionary Committee for the notorious Wuhan, making a total of nine provinces with full committees and four with Preparatory Groups, representing in all half the number of provinces. Progress has also been achieved in forming Revolutionary Committees in depth, again particularly in central provinces. In each case the chairman of a committee holds a military appointment. The predominant influence of the Army over this programme is therefore manifest.

6. The achieving of alliances and Revolutionary Committees has so far proved to be no guarantee against factional disturbance reoccurring. Shantung, which formed a committee early last year, has been one of the worst affected areas. The alliances will have even less value if the pace of their formation is to be forced in order to meet the dead-line of the Spring period set by Mao for the basic resolution of alliance problems. There would be a much greater chance of their success if the shortage of consumer goods could be overcome and unemployment reduced. In this connexion, the persistent efforts of Chou En Lai, from late September, to restore order on the railways may be accounted the most practical contribution to the desired internal stability since the directive of 5th September permitting the Army to fire-for-effect in a last resort.

7. The current resurgence of factionalism must be particularly disturbing, since it would almost seem to have the characteristic of being endemic. There have recently been strong denunciations of violence and factionalism in provincial newspapers and in radio broadcasts, in which the term 'civil war' has sometimes been used. The similarity of the charges suggests that a co-ordinated nationwide campaign is in progress. Disobedience and lack of responsiveness to central directives are probably encouraged by a belief of those concerned that they have the tacit support of elements within the top leadership. The general reluctance on the part of the Army to take repressive measures may encourage this belief. Those who participate in factional strife must at all events resent any curtailment of their new-found freedoms under the Cultural Revolution and must see in the policy of forming alliances according to trades and occupations a decision to break up their organizations beyond retrieve.

8. The campaign to eliminate factionalism may be interpreted as a prerequisite of that to form alliances and could partly explain the national preoccupation with questions of factionalism at the present time. The actuality of factionalism could therefore be rather less than might appear to be the case. The Army is repeatedly instructed to 'support the Left, but not any particular faction', on the grounds that experience had shown that where one side was supported and the other ignored mutual hostility became deeper and the situation deteriorated still further. The correct course for the Army to adopt was to unite the greatest number of people <sup>, regardless of their affiliation,</sup> ~~who could be united~~ and lead them along the path of Mao's thought.

9. A further campaign to promote solidarity between servicemen and civilians, with special emphasis on the fostering of alliances, was launched at the beginning of this year and is reaching a climax with the Spring Festival, since this is the time when visits are traditionally exchanged. The directive issued in mid-January by the Preparatory Group for Kwangtung (Canton) Provincial Revolutionary Committee calling for a massive drive to support the Army may be taken as <sup>typical</sup> ~~exemplary~~ for the nation as a whole. Mao-study courses were to be set up, in which the spirit of self-sacrifice of yet another soldier-hero in the service of the community was to be upheld for emulation. The calls of Mac and of Lin Piao in August for the mutual support of Army and People; and the two September speeches by Chiang Ching calling for an end to violence were also to be subjects of study. A particular feature of the directive, ~~but one which might not necessarily apply throughout the country,~~ was the requirement that all localities in the province make a success of conscription and the re-settlement of ex-servicemen; and that good political and organizational work be undertaken in order to ensure fulfilment of this year's quotas on conscription and demobilization. This movement was reported to have been suspended for the duration of the Cultural Revolution. The decision to reopen the movement, which in normal times would involve about 25 per cent of the Army, suggests that the risk of throwing the Army slightly off balance is acceptable under present circumstances in the province.

10. The Army remains widely committed in the civil sphere and has been given a renewed mandate through the New Year message to support industry and agriculture. Military Control Commissions are still running half the number of provinces, in addition to all media of communication; and military propaganda teams continue to tour the towns and villages. There are also incidental tasks to be performed such as supervising the reopening of schools and providing a certain amount of political and military training to students. The Army must force and has the unique distinction of an intact organization and communications structure. Moreover the military branch of the Party system seems to have suffered less from the purges of the Cultural Revolution than civilian counterparts and should therefore be in a position to take the lead in bringing them back to life. The Army is thus the sole agency capable of implementing policy on a national scale and its co-operation is therefore vital.

The Army must welcome therefore a return to more normal conditions, which a restoration of the Party at lower levels should bring, and the resultant opportunities to divest itself of some of the extra responsibilities taken on during the Cultural Revolution, as long as it did not thereby lose its dominant position.

12. The effect of the Cultural Revolution upon overall military capability remains unknown, but some impairment must have occurred if only through disruptions to training programmes. The ability to conduct guerrilla, or People's, warfare is likely to have suffered considerably less than that to conduct open warfare, and ~~could even have been enhanced, since the corresponding skills of being able to move in all manner of terrains and to communicate by all means must have been well practised.~~

13. Such evidence as there is suggests that 'forces of manoeuvre' and of high operational readiness (ie Field Armies) have been largely preserved from acquisition of new administrative tasks under the Cultural Revolution, so as to ensure their continued availability for movement between provinces in the event of emergency. Therefore, although their normal military training must have been subject to interruption, the overall military capabilities of this type of formation or unit may not have been so seriously affected. The main weight of the new administrative responsibilities is likely to have fallen on Military District troops: those who like the 'Regional Forces' of earlier days, are solely committed to their area, thus leaving the forces of manoeuvre free for strategic movement.

Dear David

Hans Bargmann, the West German press correspondent here, tells us that a few days ago he witnessed a ceremony in the Hsin Ch'iao Hotel in Peking in honour of the departure of seven young men who were members of the staff.

2. When he later questioned one of the older hotel employees about the ceremony, the latter told him, without making any attempt to conceal his delight, that the seven were being sent off to join the P.L.A.. He said that the present plan was to call up immediately 350,000 young men between the ages of 18 to 22, mostly middle school students, from all parts of China and to recruit a further 350,000 during the summer. The youths were being told that they were to serve for only two years rather than the normal four or five year terms of military service.

5. Bargmann tends to be a fairly unreliable source but there are a few indications which support this particular story. We have ourselves seen a number of squads of young men being marched about Peking wearing P.L.A. uniforms without the red collar badges. John Weston also saw what appeared to be the end of a departure ceremony similar to the one described by Bargmann.

4. According to some East Europeans, this is the first recruitment for the Army for the past two years (during which period there have been no discharges). The purpose, it is emphasised both by some East Europeans and by the Russians here, is not directly connected with the Vietnam war but is related to internal political considerations. One, probably the main, aim seems to be to remove the most extreme Red Guards from their various revolutionary organisations and subject them to military discipline (Bergmann says he identifies some of the seven recruits from the Hsin Ch'iao as being those who took a leading part in various violent incidents last summer). The recruitment is also almost certainly intended to enable the P.L.A. to return some of its members now engaged on support-the-left activities to more normal military duties. Yet another factor could be that military service is seen as one solution of the problem facing the authorities of what to do with large numbers of students who are now graduating.

THE P.L.A.: LEADERSHIP IN THE MILITARY REGIONS

Explanatory Notes:

The attached list is arranged, in alphabetical order, according to Military Regions, with the Military Districts shown under the Military Regions to which they are subordinate.

The list is divided into two parts: on the left side of each sheet are listed the leading officers of each Military Region and District, i.e. Commanders, Political Commissars, Deputy Commanders and Commissars and Chiefs of Staff, who were known or presumed to hold posts in 1966; on the right are the leading officers of each Military Region and District noted during 1967 (these were generally described in reports as "responsible persons"). The "remarks" columns give some background details of the officers concerned. In the case of officers who made their last officially reported appearance in 1966, other relevant information (e.g. criticism by Red Guards during 1967) is summarised in the left-hand "remarks" column. The ranks given for some officers are those last noted, before the abolition of ranks in 1965.

* indicates that an officer who was last noted in November 1967 or earlier, has appeared again during the first two months of 1968.

The following abbreviations have been used:

CCP	...	Chinese Communist Party
MD	...	Military District
MR	...	Military Region
MRC	...	Municipal Revolutionary Committee
PLA	...	People's Liberation Army

Repeated for information to Washington, Hong Kong and POLAD Singapore.

My telegrams Nos. 245 and 251.

It is now reasonable to assume that Yang Cheng-wu, Yu Li-chin and Fu Ch'ung-pi have fallen. There would seem to be two possible explanations of this development. It could be the result of:

- (a) a counter-attack by Leftists in leadership, instigated or supported by Mao Tse-Tung himself, who resents and wishes to halt pressure now exerted by PLA against revolutionaries, or
- (b) a move by moderate elements in leadership, presumably headed by Chou En-lai, and supported by main weight of military opinion against an extremist group within military hierarchy.

2. On the scanty evidence available so far I, and I believe, majority of observers, are inclined to favour interpretation (b). My reasons include:

- (a) interpretation (a) would represent an attack on military which would be quite contrary to the trend of present policies and would be likely to antagonise the PLA at a time when it is playing an indispensable role in the restoration and maintenance of order and industrial production;
- (b) Yang Cheng-wu who leapt into prominence at beginning of cultural revolution is generally regarded as one of the most "revolutionary" of military leaders. He has appeared to be Lin Piao's man and may well be resented by many other Service Commanders.
- (c) The attendance list at the latest reception of military cadres (my telegram No. 250) shows Huang Yung-sheng, Commander Canton military region and Chairman of Kwang Tung Revolutionary Committee, as senior serving officer present. No other provincial military leader attended and it may be that Huang has been brought to Peking to sway Yang Cheng-wu as Acting Chief of Staff. Huang, who earlier was under sustained and serious attack by the revolutionaries, appears to be a conservative in cultural revolution terms.
- (d) The attacks on Yang have coincided with official publication and rallies in support of Hsieh Fu-chih, Chairman of the Peking Revolutionary Committee, and usually thought of as a supporter of Chou En-lai.

3. Whilst acting against Yang, Yu and Fu, leadership has been at pains to give the impression that the cultural revolution continues. This could explain:

- (a) The renewed and intensive campaign against T'an Chen-lin, who is accused of attempting to "reverse the verdicts on Rightists" but who seems to have been discredited long ago.
- (b) The appearance and "important speeches" made by the members of the Cultural Revolution Group at the latest Mao receptions (my telegram No. 250, paragraph 3).

4. I must emphasize that the above is a preliminary and speculative assessment. The failure of many senior military figures, e.g. the Marshalls, to attend the latest reception is a rather puzzling feature. Poster references to a "behind the scene boss of Yang Chen-wu" (my telegram No. 251) may be an indication that other more exalted and possibly non military heads are yet to roll. What does seem certain is that this further manifestation of dissent among leadership must increase doubts of many Chinese about the Cultural Revolution itself. The disgrace of Yang Cheng-wu seems to represent a serious blow to Lin Piao's prestige although it is difficult to believe latter's position is in any real danger.

In Peking demonstrations similar to those of last few days have continued today but on a reduced scale. We have now seen several posters demanding that Li Fu-ch'un (member of the Politbureau Standing Committee) should reveal his "black links" with T'an Chen-lin and Yu Ch'iu-li (Minister of Petroleum). Li Fu-ch'un is also being accused of being "boss behind the scenes of the February counter-current" and has been described as a person of the Ho Lung type. Other posters describe Yu Ch'iu-li as Ho Lung's "able general" in the February counter-current.

2. There are many posters now on display welcoming the decision of Chairman Mao Tse-tung and Vice Chairman/Huang Yung-sheng (Commander of Canton military region and Chairman of Kwangtung Revolutionary Committee) as Chief of Staff and Wen Yu-ch'eng (3306-3768-2052) (formerly Chief of Staff of

Peking telegram No. 245: New attacks on P.L.A. Leaders

You may like to have first thoughts of State Department about latest events, based on reports from their Consulate General in Hong Kong and on monitored broadcasts. / Deputy Director of Asian Communist Affairs told Counsellor on 27 March that all three leaders had two things apparently in common. All had come to power during the most extreme stage of the cultural revolution. (Yu was one of those held in Wuhan last July.) All three were believed also to have formerly served closely with Peng Te-Huai, though this may be fortuitous. It could however equally be the reason which may later publicly emerge if their disgrace is confirmed.

2. On the face it seemed therefore that the pragmatists were again getting at the extremists. So far they had picked them off one by one; perhaps they were getting more confident of their strength. State Department see the hand of Chou En-lai in this, though his name has not been mentioned throughout the reports. They admit that there are certain unknowns still to be explained. A Japanese report talked of posters calling for "support of Mao's decision". Was this "decision" the removal of the three? Is Mao, however, likely to have made such a "decision" or are those who removed the three speaking in his name? The United States reports from Hong Kong also spoke of a parade of 100,000 people through Peking calling for the disgrace of the three; they also spoke of handbills being distributed calling for support of Mao, Chiang Ching and Lin Piao - these three names only being linked together.

/Is

Is this an initiative by the last solid Maoists? If so, what has happened to Chen Po-ta and Kang Sheng?

3. State Department are also speculating that the old Marshals are re-establishing their authority within P.L. at the expense of upstart political officers like Yu. What they cannot clearly see at present is where Lin Piao stands. Nor are the references to support for Hsieh Fu-chih clear unless it is to differentiate him from Fu Chùng-pi the leading military officer on the Peking municipal Committee.

4. Another line of speculation perhaps less plausible is based on the idea that there has again been an increase in internal propaganda about an imminent U.S. invasion and that these reports have been deliberately spread to create a war psychosis. In such circumstances the P.L.A., assuming that they were about to be called upon to fulfil their military role, may have demanded the overthrow of those who have been calling for a predominantly political role for the force.

5. State Department would be interested to hear what you think.

The demonstrations in Peking, which we reported on Saturday, were not continued on Sunday or today. The attacks on Li Fu Ch'un have not been developed. Most posters criticising him have been removed or covered over, although at least one fairly prominent poster calling for him to be bombarded is still visible along the main street.

2. A number of posters have appeared describing Yeh Chien-Ying (A Marshal and [gp undec] member) as "The Black Boss behind Yang Ch'eng-Wu". The latter, who is still under heavy poster attack, has also been linked with Hsiao Hua (former Director of PLA General Political Department). Both these are being held responsible for a "bloody incident" which took place on 13 May last year (when a drama performance by PLA units was forcibly broken up). Hsiao Hua is also being connected with An Tzu-Wen (former Director of Organisation Department of Central Committee) although link between them is still not clear.

Dear James,

for pm 24/4

As we have already reported by telegram Yang Ch'eng-wu, Acting Chief of Staff of the P.L.A. since 1966, Yu Li-chin, Political Commissar of the Air Force, and Fu Ch'ung-pi, Peking Garrison Commander, fell from grace at the end of March. The formal announcement of their fall was almost certainly made on 24 March when the Chinese leaders headed by Mao and Lin Piao attended a meeting of some 10,000 P.L.A. cadres and Lin Piao delivered what the People's Daily described as "a very important instruction". Posters of Yang's replacement by Huang Yung-sheng and Fu's replacement by Wen Yu-ch'eng, both from Canton, were seen on 28 March. Posters condemning the three displaced men as plotters, careerists, and counter-revolutionaries were by then on every wall.

2. The sudden removal of these three very important military figures is the most serious upset the Chinese leadership has sustained since the stirring days of early 1967. The importance of the event was marked by the attendance of Mao and Lin at the cadres' reception. According to persistent rumour Mao himself broke all precedent and uttered a few words, croaking out "Down with Yang Cheng-wu". The crisis coincided with a rash of posters, Red Guard newspapers and demonstrations which suggested that the Cultural Revolution had taken on a new lease of life. According to posters, in addition to the meeting on 24 March, another at which most of the leaders spoke, with a particularly important speech by Chiang Ch'ing, was held on 27 March. Nevertheless, the crisis remains obscure in its origin and implications and anything said at this stage must be largely conjecture.

3. The most promising official clue seems to be the People's Daily editorial of 30 March, defending Revolutionary Committees and publishing Mao's latest directive, on the same subject. It seems reasonable to link this with the preceding crisis and the removal of Yang Ch'eng-wu. Such high-level defence, buttressed by holy writ, suggests that Revolutionary Committees have come under serious criticism. We know that Hsieh Fu-chih, as Head of the Peking Committee, was officially defended in posters some weeks before. Yang Ch'eng-wu, in particular through the Peking Garrison Commander, Fu Ch'ung-pi, could have been responsible for attacks on the Peking Committee and it seems he was in fact accused of such attacks in the speeches of 27 March. As regards the line of attack, our first thought on reading the editorial, with its emphasis on the revolutionary masses and the need for a leadership not divorced from the masses, was that criticism had been concentrated on the revolutionary component and that Yang might even have advocated some simplified administration based on cadres and P.L.A. alone. But it now seems much more likely that he was criticising the Revolutionary Committees for providing a means for too easy restoration of old cadres (see paragraph 6 below). Whatever their terms, such attacks must have been dangerous, since criticism of Revolutionary Committees amounts to a denial of a year or more's revolutionary work and, what is worse, casts doubt on the strategic insight of the Chairman himself.

4. A further line of investigation is opened up by a report, in the "Survey of China Mainland Press", No. 4148 of 9 March, of remarks by Lin Piao, Chou En-lai, Chiang Ch'ing and Yang Ch'eng-wu at a reception at an unspecified date to comrades of the Political Work Unit, the Literary and Art Unit and the Army Daily Unit of the Military Commission. This report reveals the existence of these three units which, according to Lin Piao, are charged with "finding out conditions at lower levels in the Army", "investigating and discovering problems, making suggestions and seeking instructions from related Departments". It also reveals some dissatisfaction on the part of Lin Piao and the Cultural Revolution Group with the style of work of these three bodies. They are told not to wrangle with each other. The Army Daily Unit is told to call more frequently on Ch'en Po-ta and Yao Wen-yuan and the Literary and Art Unit inevitably is told to seek more frequent advice from Chiang Ch'ing. It seems that Yang Ch'eng-wu, who had general responsibility for these bodies, was showing signs of following the dangerous precedent of Hsiao Hua, the former head of the General Political Department of the P.L.A., who sank without trace last summer. He was engaged on empire-building, asking for more men for his political unit. It also appears that he was also too apt to take responsibility upon himself without seeking higher advice. This overweening style seems to have aroused criticism, evident even in this short report, from Lin, the Cultural Revolution Group and even from Chou En-lai;

5. The speeches of 27 March, which have now come to hand and are enclosed with Ray Whitney's letter in this bag to John Boyd, do not cast much further light. They consist in the main of defences of the Cultural Revolution, fulsome praise of Cultural Revolution colleagues and generalised abuse of Yang Ch'eng-wu. He is, however, accused specifically of seeking to seize control of the Air Force via Yu Li-ch'un and of attacking the Peking Revolutionary Committee through Fu Ch'ung-pi. For good measure K'ang Sheng accuses him of plotting to seize the Peking Radio Station and the Liberation Army Daily, though this may be pure embroidery. Chou En-lai draws the parallel with Hsiao Hua.

40 6. The most helpful information on the matter, however, comes to us via the Russians and ultimately from posters reporting speeches on 24 March (Whitney gives a detailed report in his letter of today's date). According to this information, Yang Ch'eng-wu was originally appointed by Mao in disregard of Lin Piao and had developed dangerous ambitions by December of last year. He built up his position as the sole channel for transmitting the instructions of the Cultural Revolution Group to Provincial Military Commanders. He arrogated a special position to the Army in the administration of the country and in Revolutionary Committees and opposed the reinstatement of old cadres in Revolutionary Committees, since this naturally watered down Army authority. He is also alleged to have reduced the time allotted to Mao-study by Army men, though I personally do not make too much of this last point. His ambitions aroused the concern of Chou En-lai and Lin Piao who made a joint demarche to Mao, without success. The two then sought the help of Chiang Ch'ing, who was effective not only in persuading her husband but also in ferretting out black material on Yang Ch'eng-wu.

7. These theories may not coincide in every detail but they have sufficient in common to indicate that we are on the right lines. The picture of an ambitious man building up his position at the centre of the military hierarchy and thereby running foul of the Cultural Revolution Group, also a man who made some trenchant criticisms of Revolutionary Committees is not implausible. I suppose the correct communist classification for Yang Ch'eng-wu would be as a Bonapartist. He is now officially described here as a Right opportunist. Nevertheless the labels Right or Left may be inappropriate in this case. As with Hsiao Hua, the main reason for disgrace may be a power struggle rather than questions of principle. Equally the action against him seems to have united both wings of the present Government, both Chou En-lai and the Cultural Revolution Group. His dismissal seems to have been less a reaction from the Left or the Right than an attempt by the leaders to preserve what may be called the present revolutionary establishment.

8. One strand in the crisis I have not commented on is the pressure from the Left on certain old cadres under the guise of attacks on the "new February counter-current" and attempts to "reverse the verdict (sc. on old cadres) (see John Weston's letter of 2 April). This has meant renewed criticism of Tan Chen-lin, Director of the Office of Agriculture and Forestry (disgraced in 1967 and a very dead horse to flog) and, more interestingly, Yu Ch'iu-li, Minister of Petroleum (much criticised in 1967 but finally salvaged by Chou En-lai). It has also meant momentary criticism of Li Fu-ch'un (a member of the Standing Committee of the Politburo) and of Marshal Yeh Chien-ying (a member of the Politburo and criticised in 1967 for suppressing the revolution in certain areas). It is hard to say how strong this pressure is but it certainly exists. Chiang Ch'ing took the opportunity of her speech of 27 March to make some further criticisms of Yu Ch'iu-li. The list of attendance at the meeting of 24 March is also interesting. The absentees were Li Fu-ch'un, Ch'en Yi, Liu Po-ch'eng, Li Hsien-nien, Hsu Hsiang-ch'ien, Nieh Jung-chen, Yeh Chien-ying, Su Yu and Yu Ch'iu-li. This was a military and not very representative meeting so that the absence of civilians may not mean very much. On the other hand none of the Marshals was present. This may well have significance. But we shall have to wait for a fully representative meeting, probably May Day, to draw any firm conclusions.

9. The following general comments may be made on the affair, subject to many reservations because of the incomplete state of our knowledge:

- (a) The impassioned defence of the Revolutionary Committees reveals not only the flimsiness of the new administrative structures but also the delicacy of the operation on which the Chinese leaders are now embarked. While continuing to pay lip service to the Cultural Revolution, they are winding up the movement. They are therefore very sensitive to criticism that might encourage people to draw the logical conclusion from what is happening and begin to question the value of the Cultural Revolution itself and its author.

/Equally,

Equally, calls to "reverse the verdict" are threatening since to do so on one old cadre can very soon lead to demands to reverse the verdict on Liu Shao-ch'i himself. When the achievements of the revolution are so slight and the ground swell of doubt among the public is so great, criticism from almost any quarter can assume dangerous proportions. There is a parallel here with the period immediately after the failure of the Great Leap Forward and Mao is no doubt keenly aware of it. It is possible that he may be encouraging the pressure from the Left against the "new February counter-current" in order to preserve some freedom of manoeuvre for himself and to avoid a situation in which, as in 1959, he becomes the prisoner of the moderates.

- (b) However we explain it, the affair seems to have been something of a setback to the P.L.A. In the person of the Acting Chief of Staff it has been convicted of showing insufficient deference to the Cultural Revolution Group. Yang had failed to consult Ch'en Po-ta and Chiang Ch'ing as often as he should and it seems that the latter still has a brief to meddle with Army matters under the cover of purifying art and literature. Although Yang may not have been a widely popular figure in Army circles, this interference with military concerns may produce a reaction from the P.L.A. The absence of the Marshals from the 24 March meeting is also relevant and there may be a question mark at least over Yeh Chien-ying.
- (c) The episode has enhanced the importance of Chiang Ch'ing. She appears as the leading investigator of Yang Ch'eng-wu and apparently made the main speech on 27 March. Slogans saying "Learn from Chiang Ch'ing" and "Defend to the death Mao and Lin and Chiang Ch'ing" have been plentiful. A Peking Daily editorial of 7 April goes out of its way to pay tribute to her. It is also just possible that she may have taken the place of Li Fu-ch'un on the Standing Committee of the Politburo. Her name came sixth on the list, immediately after that of K'ang Sheng.

I am sending a copy of this letter to Anthony Elliott in Hong Kong, Michael Wilford in Washington, Reg Hibbert in Singapore and to Chancery, Canberra.

Dear John,

The Yang Cheng-wu affair is a mystery which has produced many theories among observers in Peking. We have just been told of another which seems to us to be the most plausible we have heard so far. It was passed to us by the inevitable Bargmann, the DPA correspondent, who obtained it from the Russians. The Russians in turn got most of their information from their Mongolian allies whose physical characteristics permit them to continue to read Peking posters with relative ease. In handling this information one should therefore pay due regard to the number of links and languages through which it has passed.

2. According to this thesis Yang Cheng-wu's appointment as Acting Chief of Staff of the PLA was the personal decision of Mao Tse-tung and was made against the wishes of Lin Piao himself. Lin had therefore always borne something of a grudge against Yang. The final straw, and Lin's opportunity to act against Yang, whose growing power Lin felt to be a threat to his own position, came on 19 December last year. On this date Yang Cheng-wu addressed a meeting of PLA cadres in Peking. He said that it was good for the PLA to be connected with the masses but it should not get confused by them. It was also very good that classes to study the thought of Mao Tse-tung were organised in the PLA but the Army should never forget that it had a fighting task as well. Yang therefore laid down that the PLA should run Mao study classes for only one month each year. He went on to say that at present the Army had both great responsibility and great influence. It was the linch-pin of all revolutionary committees. The PLA should keep that influence but could only do so if it made sure that not too many old rehabilitated cadres got back into positions of power. If that happened, said Yang, the influence of the PLA would automatically be curtailed. He then emphasised that he was the only one who was authorised to pass on orders from the Cultural Revolution Group to provincial military commanders and that only orders issued and signed by him were valid.

3. Following this speech, so the story goes, both Lin Piao and Chou En-lai decided to act against Yang Cheng-wu and they made complaints about him to Mao. When Mao refused their requests for Yang Cheng-wu's dismissal, they turned for help to Chiang Ch'ing when she returned to the scene in January (it is thought after illness and convalescence). Eventually Chiang Ch'ing collected sufficient material on Yang Cheng-wu, Yu Li-chin and Fu Chung-pi and was able to persuade Mao to sign the order dismissing them on 22 March.

At the PLA rally on 24 March, which, according to Czech colleagues, was attended by the commanders and political commissars of all the Chinese military regions, Lin Piao began the proceedings by reading the order dismissing Yang, Yu and Fu. Lin denounced them as counter-revolutionaries who had planned a coup against the proletarian headquarters led by Mao and claimed that the demand for their dismissal had come from many within the PLA. Senior Army commanders believed that Yang had deliberately spread false orders, claiming that they came from the Cultural Revolution Group in order to create anarchy and chaos within the country to serve his own evil purposes.

5. Lin was followed by K'ang Sheng, who said that all should be extremely grateful to Chiang Ch'ing because she had discovered the plot and that her vigilance had made it possible to avert a coup d'etat. K'ang said that the crimes of Yang and his fellow plotters, whom he described, inter alia, as "dog's urine", were almost too great to be put into words. They were "splittists, opportunists and careerists" who had colluded with the extreme left, represented by Ch'i Pen-yu, Wang Li and Kuan Feng and also with the capitalist roaders led by China's Khrushchev. Yang and company had tried to form an unsavoury alliance with all these evil elements to attack the proletarian headquarters. K'ang Sheng then concluded his speech with more fulsome praise of Chiang Ch'ing.

6. Chou En-lai followed K'ang and fully endorsed the decision to dismiss Yang, Yu and Fu. He then announced the appointment of Huang Yung-sheng as the new, permanent, Chief of Staff and of Wen Yu-ch'eng as the Commander of Peking Military Region. Chou claimed that Huang had worked for a long time to frustrate Yang Cheng-wu's plots against the proletarian headquarters. Chou said that Yang Cheng-wu's crimes were somewhat similar to the crimes committed by Lo Jui-ching "during the long absence of Vice Chairman Lin Piao". At the conclusion of Chou's speech Mao Tse-tung himself appeared on the platform to croak out "Down with Yang Cheng-wu".

7. Percy Cradock, in an accompanying letter in this bag, will be offering some comments on this account and also on the general implications of the Yang Cheng-wu affair. I would only say here that it seems to us to fit most of the facts that we know at present. It explains something of Chiang Ch'ing's role and could account for the current bout of adulation she is enjoying. It also fits in with other reports which have appeared in Red Guard newspapers that Yang Cheng-wu had been attacking revolutionary committees on the grounds that too many old cadres were now using them to creep back into power.

8. We have also obtained a digest of the speeches made at the rally on 27 March when Chinese leaders gave their version of the Yang Cheng-wu affair to 100,000 members of the PLA and the masses. I enclose one copy of this document but regret that our copying facilities and the time available does not permit me to do so for other recipients of this letter. I should be grateful, therefore, if you would arrange for other copies to be made as required.

As the authorised version of the incident which is intended for consumption by the Chinese public, these speeches, although very long, are not particularly informative. At least one can say that nothing in them conflicts with the version of Yang Cheng-wu episode which I have recounted above. You will see Chiang Ch'ing takes a leading role and that the other leaders give her the main credit for "dealing with" Yang and his group (e.g. page 4). K'ang Sheng (page 6) accuses Yang of being a man who in reality was on the side of Lo Jui-ching and Ho Lung. He claims that Yang collected black material on Chiang Ch'ing, colluded with Yu Li-chin to overthrow Wu Fa-hsien and grab power in the Air Force and with Fu Chung-pi to overthrow Hsieh Fu-chih and grab power in the Peking Revolutionary Committee. We have, incidentally, heard other speculation from the Russians that Yang attempted to displace Hsieh Fu-chih because of the latter's control of the Public Security apparatus.

10. Chou En-lai (page 7) is particularly careful to emphasise the great role played by the PLA in the course of the Cultural Revolution although this point is also made by the other speakers. Chou denounces Yang Cheng-wu as a right opportunist and appears to link him by implication with Hsiang Hua.

--- 11. Finally, I enclose for all recipients of this letter a copy of a Red Guard newspaper on the Yang Cheng-wu affair. It does not throw a great deal of light on the situation but its allegations about the way Nieh Yuan-tze was manipulated by Yang, Yu and Fu and how the three criminals "used certain weaknesses and mistakes" in the Mao study groups organised by the Peking Revolutionary Committee and Peking Revolutionary Garrison are of some interest.

I am copying this letter to Frank Brewer in JRD, Colin Wilson in IRD, McKearney in PUSD, Denison Cross in DIS, George Walden and Ashworth in Hong Kong, Reg Hibbert in Singapore, Roy Spendlove in Washington and Peter Hewitt in Canberra.

Editorial

Our great leader Chairman Mao, his close Comrade-in-Arms Vice-Chairman Lin Piao and the proletarian headquarters led by Chairman Mao have plucked out the bosses behind the scenes of the "February counter-current", the counter-revolutionary careerists and plotters Yang Cheng-wu, Yu li-ching and Fu Ching-pi. This is another great victory for Chairman Mao's revolutionary line . . . . Our East is Red warriors resolutely support this brilliant stroke of our Party, Central Committee and Chairman Mao.

The plucking out of Yang, Yu and Fu is the announcement of the death sentence on the black general of the February counter-current T'an Chen-lin.

The plucking out of Yang, Yu and Fu marks the total disgrace of the counter-revolutionary small clown Nieh Yuan-tze who, under their manipulation sought to reverse the verdict on the February counter-current, bombard Vice Premier Hsieh and overthrow the Revolutionary Committee. . . . . The forward march of history always causes the reactionaries to greatly over-estimate their own strength and greatly under-estimate the strength of the people so that they muddle-headedly think to preen themselves as "heroes" attempting to turn back the main tide but quickly become contemptible worms. . . . . At present the black wind abroad in society to reverse the verdict on the February counter-current has been blown up by Liu, Teng, T'ao, Yang, Yu and Fu. They used the February counter-current group led by the counter-revolutionary small clown, Nieh Yuan-tze as their obedient tool with which they would achieve their own ends.

They hoped on the one hand in the name of opposing Kuan, Wang Chi to say that all the Central Committee directives which were not in accord with their wishes were the work of Kuan Wang-chi and thus bombard the proletarian headquarters. On the otherhand they used the pretext of opposing Kuan, Wang, Chi to blacken the names of all those people who did not follow their line and lumped them together with Kuan, Wang, Chi and described the revolutionary committees which they opposed as the "No. 2 group" of Kuan, Wang, Chi thus seeking to legalise their crimes of opposing the revolutionary committees.

This wave of thinking just like the extreme "left" reactionary wave which appeared earlier, pointed the spear against the headquarters of the proletariat against the new-born red political organs and against the PLA. It was simply that it wore different clothes and waved different banners.

They fanned the fires, spreading wounding lies and pointed the spear directly against Comrade Hsieh Fu-chih, the head of the Peking Revolutionary Committee and attacked this or that shortcoming or excess and used certain weaknesses and mistakes in the Mao Tse-tung-study groups organised by the Peking Revolutionary Committee and the Peking Military Garrison to point the spear against the Revolutionary Committee and the great PLA. . . . . East is Red warriors, revolutionary comrades, have we not always said that we must resolutely follow Chairman Mao's great strategic dispositions? Now we must immediately rise up and stand in the front line of the class struggle and actively and unceasingly open fire on the class enemy and resolutely oppose right opportunism, oppose right splittism and attack the rightist reverse the verdict evil wind.

We must at all times maintain high revolutionary vigilance and prevent the class enemy, in the struggle going on at this time, provoking factionalism or fishing in troubled waters. Misled comrades of the February counter-current group, have we not always said that one must be boundlessly loyal to Chairman Mao? Now is the time to take action to carry out your own promises. Important speeches by Chiang Ching, Yang Sheng, Chen Po Fa and Chen En-lai delivered at 27th March.

Speeches delivered by the leaders to a <sup>100,000</sup>~~200,000~~ strong mixed audience of PLA, Red Guards, workers, peasants, teachers and students.

Chen En-lai Premier Chen will read out the instructions of the Party Centre and orders of Chairman Mao and Vice Chairman Lin.

Chen En-lai read out the following decision of the Central Committee, State Council, Military Affairs Commission and Cultural Revolution Group dated 22 March 1968:

According to the decision of Chairman Mao and Vice
Chairman Lin:

(i) Yang Cheng Wu has committed exceedingly serious mistakes and therefore it is decided to dismiss him from posts of Acting Chief of Staff, Standing Committee of Military Affairs Commission, Secretary General, Military Affairs Commission and First Secretary, General Staff Department.

(ii) Ye Li Chin has committed exceedingly serious mistakes. Furthermore he is a renegade. He is dismissed from his posts of the Political Commissar, Air Force and Second Secretary, Party Committee Air Force.

(iii) Fu Guang Pi has made serious mistakes and is dismissed as Commander, Peking Garrison Command-General.

This decision is to be communicated to all fighters and commanders.

Speech by Chiang Ching To-day's meeting is being held because some comrades wanted us to explain something and we also wanted to tell them something. International and internal situation is excellent. Imperialists, revisionists and reactionaries are confronted by a financial crisis.
In name it is a financial crisis, in reality it involves rising prices, depreciating value of currency, hoarding, shut-down of factories etc. . Isnt the fact that life has become difficult for imperialists, revisionists and reactionaries to our advantage? (Audience: Yes!) They are They are day by day approaching a disastrous exit. And we?
Let us not speak of something distant. Let us just speak of the situation since we entered the cultural revolution.
Our currency has been stable. Basic living standards and prices have been stable. In agriculture we had a bumper harvest last year. In industry there were several inventions.
Naturally in some places fighting led to a decline in production. But the nearest revolutionary great alliance and revolutionary 3-way alliance were achieved, production quickly shot up and production targets were exceeded. Isn't this an excellent situation? (Hsieh Fu Chi: Long live the victory of Chairman Mao's proletarian revolutionary line. Long live CPC!) Our life is improving day by day. Things look fear comparison. Comrades should compare these two situations a little. Isn't it excellent?

The situation in CPC is also excellent. 18 provinces and cities already have revolutionary committees. Another 4 provinces are soon awaiting central ratification. Rest are in the process of fermentation and will come to Peking for solution. Before May Day, basically (sic) every province will have established revolutionary committee....

We must firmly oppose those who do not accept that the situation is excellent and seek to paint it in black colours. The CPC situation in Peking is excellent. Some people say that the revolution in Shanghai is in a better situation than in Peking. This is concrete analysis. Each has its good and bad points. We cannot say that such and such place is better than Peking, or that Peking is better than such and such place. We cannot speak in such an absolute terms. The excellent situation in Peking manifests itself in the fact that the working class and poor and lower-middle peasants can already manage the situation of revolutionary struggle (Ye Chen: Consolidate the Red regime's revolutionary committees! Consolidate Peking revolutionary committee! Defend the party Centre led by Chairman Mao! Strengthen the pillar of proletarian dictatorship - PLA. Firmly support Chiang Ching's "5th September" decision!)

Comrades, I am an ordinary party member.... (She then goes on to indulge in a display of modesty, interperated by slogans led by Ye Chen and Hsieh Fu Chi calling for learning from and protecting Chiang Ching)... There is no one who is consistently correct all his life. I certainly am not such a person. I too have made mistakes and we still have shortcomings. If I make a mistake, comrades can bombard me and write posters about me. Some institutes say "fry" me, "execute" me. When I have spare times I go there to see they "fry" me (laughter).... Chiang Ching then goes on to discuss double dealers, plotters and points out that with respect to them there is usually a "process of recognition" (Translator's note: That is, they are only gradually recognized and discovered as such), particularly we who work at the side of Chairman Mao cannot arbitrarily suspect a person. It needs very close investigation...

~~SECRET~~ the nature of a bad

Before we can discover another ~~bad~~ thing we have ~~examined~~ it in all sorts of circumstances. ~~Examination~~. This was true also in cases of such renegades, counter revolutionaries and double faced careerists who wormed their way into the party as Lio Tang Tao, Peng Te lun, Ho Lung, Peng, Lu, "o and Yang (Ye Chun: Down with Chiang Kuo) (Heich: Down with ang, Kuan and Chi). If there had not been a GPCR, they could never have been exposed. This is a great merit achieved by revolutionary young fighters....

(On "February adverse current"...)...

Last February, ~~when~~ the black general renegade Tan Chen Lin as representative, it emerged to ~~unveil~~ <sup>wrongly</sup> on Lio Tang Tao. Since this struggle took place in a very small circle the broad masses did not know. Therefore they with ulterior motives exploit this to mislead revolutionary young fighters, revolutionary masses, reversing black and white and saying: "Whoever opposes Yu Chien Li ~~xx~~, ~~xx~~, is opposing the Premier and opposing Chairman Mao". In fact Yu Chien Li is (was ?) a confidante of Ho Lung. Chairman Mao says that you must (i) criticise and (ii) protect. We are still acting accordingly. But revolutionary fighters should not allow themselves to be cheated by this. This spearhead of the 'February adverse current' was primarily directed against the proletarian headquarters headed by Chairman Mao and Lin, FLA, the newly born revolutionary committees. It opposed the GPCR and refused to accept the achievements of GPCR, that is, refused to accept the achievements of revolutionary masses and revolutionary young fighters. Under the leadership of Chairman and Vice Chairman Lin, we crushed them and thoroughly exposed them.

Ye Chun: Down with the black claws of Lio and Tang - Wang, Kuan and Chi. They were to oppose red flags, <sup>to oppose</sup> ~~opposing~~ red flags and went about practising ~~disruption~~ <sup>deception</sup>. They did not ask for instructions, did not report to us, blockaded us (that is, kept information away from us) and maliciously sought to bring evil up on us. Because they black claws therefore we dealt with them. We would not permit them to disturb Chairman Mao's ~~great~~ <sup>great</sup> strategic plan. But some people exploit this sort of ~~fact~~ <sup>fact</sup> to negate the victories of the GPCR, to negate revolutionary masses and the merits of revolutionary young fighters.

(Ye Chun:Defend to death C.R.group. Guard against the plotting activities of February adverse current. Down with Tan Chen Lin) Since they waved the red flag to oppose the red flag they were able to fool certain number of masses. Because of this we adopted a very cautious policy towards them, the policy of division. Wang and Kuan could not be separated. Chi Pen Yu's mode of operation was not identical and therefore we separated him for a period of time. But to separate him did not mean that there were no problems in relation to him. In the event in the latter half of last year he became even more frenzied and many improper things took place.. We, internally, carried out a series of principled struggles with him. My last November speech at the art and culture forum, was in fact meant to be a criticism of Chi without mentioning him by name. He colluded with Yang ChMeng Wu, their collusions started very early. We did not know about it. Chi also colluded with Yu Li Chin and Fu Chung Pi. They incited the masses and said that bad people had emerged in the cultural revolution group. They did this in order to negate the cultural revolution group. Furthermore all these bad eggs were dealt with by the cultural revolution group itself. (Chen Po Ta: By Chiang Ching. The Premier and other leaders agreed with Chen Po Ta) I feel that all the merit should not be attributed to any person. It should go to our great leader Chairman Mao, to revolutionary masses, to PLA.

Yang Cheng Wu wrote an article entitled "Establish in a thorough going way the absolute authority of Chairman Mao and of his great thought". I oppose this article on two occasions in accordance with Chairman Mao's instructions. But he would not listen and insisted on publishing it. In fact what he wanted to establish was his own absolute authority. He was a double faced plotter who set up a very small mountain strong hold of his own instead of the big strong hall of China... On 8th March he supported Fu Chung Pi in organising a wanton armed intrusion on two vehicles into the premises of the cultural revolution group without the permission of the cultural revolution group! We firmly oppose this and seriously criticised him. From that day on, Yang suddenly said that he was ill. In fact, behind our backs, he daily held meetings, daily hatched plots. He wanted to capture power in the air force. Yu Li Chin wanted to use him to seize comrade Wu Fa Hsien's power....

The Peking University has two militant organisations. They wrote a letter to Chairman Mao, Vice Chairman Lin and us. At that time we were holding a meeting. I did not receive it. I entrusted comrade Hsieh to go and get this letter. But....

something strange happened. Fu Chung Pi sent a man called xxx to the Peking University to get "to the bottom of it" collecting name lists, looking far behind the scene bosses etc. This was improper. In this way they seized the right of the revolutionary masses to transmit material to Chairman Mao, Lin Biao and cultural revolution group. That evening or next, comrade Nien rang us unapologetically to inform us of the crisis. We were already very tired, but we still went and met her. She reported on the situation to Chen Po Ta and me. I explained to her what I wanted. But that we did not know what had happened below. At the same time we frankly ~~heard~~ <sup>stated</sup> the facts and that Wang, Kuan and Chi ~~were~~ <sup>were</sup> black claws and did not deserve such a fuss. However she acted in this way with that not impede the general direction, but she still carried out one battle(?) Nien has shortcomings and has made mistakes. You should criticise her but also protect her.

To reverse the verdict on the February adverse current is evil. Tan Chen Lin is a renegade. I protected him in the past. But now I say "Down with Tan Chen Lin! He is a black general of Liao and Tang. Now we have here proof that he is a renegade".

In the history of our party, in the struggle between 2 lines, there has always been left deviationist adventurism as well as right conservatism. Today it is right conservatism and right ~~superstition~~ <sup>opportunism</sup> which has acquired prominence among the revolutionaries. We must crush it. All the bad people I have discussed above had a common objective - to bring about capitalist restoration. Concretely they sought in vain to wreck the proletarian headquarters headed by Chairman Mao, and Vice Chairman Lin. (Chiang Ching then goes on to pay fulsome tributes to the PL and at that stage Wu Pu Hsien led the audience in slogans pledging loyalty to Chairman Mao, Lin Biao, Chiang Ching, Cultural Revolution Group etc.)

Chiang Ching then went on to make the standard remarks about the necessity of distinguishing between friends and enemies and about the necessity of raising one's vigilance. She concluded with a series of slogans which included the following in that order:

Long Live the Red Guards!

Long Live the PLA!

~~Speech of Yang Sheng~~ I fully support the decisions of Party Centre announced by the Premier which are based on the brilliant instructions of Chairman Mao and Vice Chairman Lin Biao, that is the dismissal of Yang Cheng Wu and Fu Chung Pi and the dealing according to law with Yu Li Chin.

SECRET

Echoing Chiang Ching's view that with respect to double dealers there is a process of recognition, Kang Sheng goes on to say: "We did not previously see the true nature of Yang, Yu and Fu.... But in the course of the cultural revolution many facts emerged to prove that Yang Cheng Wu was a double dealer. As Vice Chairman Lin has pointed out, his opposition to Lo Jui Ching was false and in reality he was a L's man. His opposition to Peng, Lu, Lo and Yang was false. In reality he was a confidante of Peng Chen. His opposition to Ho Lung was false. In reality as far back as Yenan times, he was a bosom friend of Ho Lung. Now he wants to seize the power of the PLA and the air force. He pretended to oppose Wang, Kuan and Chi but in fact was their behind the scene boss. He was collecting black material on Chiang Ching along with Chi Pen Yu. He ordered Fu Chung Pi to break into the premises of cultural revolution groups. In collusion with Yu Li Chin, he sought to overthrow Wu Fu Hsien and grab power in the air force. In collaboration with Fu Chung Pi he sought to overthrow Vice Premier Hsieh and grab power in Peking Revolutionary Committee. He sought to capture the Radio Station, the Liberation Army Daily and the People's Daily and this is only what we have discovered up to now. I suspect that you comrades will later be able to expose even bigger problems.

Lin/Tung line

No matter what tricks he used his ultimate objective was to reverse the verdicts on the Liao-Tung-Lin, on Liu Tong and Tao, Peng Te Kwei, Lo Jui Ching, Ho Lung, Peng, Lu, Lo and Yang and on the February adverse current of the Yan Chen Lin.

Kang Sheng then proceeds to elaborate further what Chiang Ching had said on the February adverse current. He says: They attacked the Head and Deputy Head of Cultural Revolution Group, Chen Po Ta and Chiang Ching. Particularly clear was their opposition to the Yenan rectification movement led by Chairman Mao... They slandered TMT as being metaphysical and GPCR as "lacking party leadership". They pretended to protect old cadres and their relatives but in fact under that guise they protected those ghosts and monsters, the capitalist roaders... They fooled a few people, particularly the youth to serve their anti-party clique.... They wished to reverse the verdict even on that running dog of Soviet revisionism Wang Ming. However, there had been no Yenan rectification, then, there would have been no victory in the war of liberation..

TMT tells us that the basic question of the revolution is the question of power. We must be on our guard against the "extreme left" and even more so against the extreme right, who wish to shake the proletarian headquarters, the PLA and the new revolutionary committees.

Referring to how some people used the attacks on Wang, Kuan and Chi to attack proletarian headquarters and the cultural revolution group, Kang Sheng went on to say: "What sort of a person was Wang Li? - a KMT man, and an activist carrying out the policy of 'SAN HUO YI SHAO' of Teng Hsiao Ping and Wang Chia Hsiang. In 1962, in Moscow, he carried out the Liao-Teng line of 'SAN HUO YI SHAO', and was praised and awarded for this by Khrushchev. And what about Kuan Feng and Chi Pen Yu? They were confidantes of Peng Cheng. Peng Cheng used to invite Chi Pen Yu to dinner and Chi Pen Yu used in turn/praise Peng Cheng. This inside story we were not aware of before. It was exposed during the cultural revolution, particularly by Gaiang Ching.

Praising the PLA, Kang Sheng claims: Falling out of Yang Yu and Fu is a great triumph and merit of the PLA. Therefore we must guard against anybody exploiting this incident to turn the spearhead against the PLA.

Speaking about the revolutionary committees, Kang Sheng says that such bad people as Fu Chung Pi and Chou Ching Feng, must certainly be pulled out. But this must not be used to attack the new red regimes - the revolutionary committees.

Kang Sheng ends his speech by calling upon his audience to raise their vigilance and not to assume that all double dealers, plotters and careerists have been over thrown. "So long as class struggle exists, a handful of counter revolutionaries will exist".

Speech by Chen Po Yao: We have had five major struggles in the course of the Cultural Revolution against the following:

- (i) Peng, Lu, Lo and Yang
- (ii) Lin, Teng and Tao
- (iii) February adverse current headed by Tan Chen Lin and co.
- (iv) Wang, Kuan and Chi, and now against
- (v) Yang, Yu and Fu at a time when Cultural Revolution is moving towards all round victory

CHEN YU-KUAN: He expressed his support for the above decision and speeches. He denounced mountain strong-holdism and sectarianism and pointed out that such tendencies were harmful to the party, PLA etc. His remarks appear to have been directed to the PLA members of the audience. He pointed out that Yang Cheng Wa had taken the same road as Peng Te Kuan and Lo Jui Ching and he had to fall in the same way. He expressed the belief that only a small minority in the PLA were with Yang, Yu and Fu and called upon them to wake up and draw a clear line of demarcation between themselves and this clique. He emphasized the great role which PLA had played particularly in the course of GPCR. He went out of his way to praise theeking Garrison Command who had looked after and protected 13 million Red Guards (Translator's note: probably reference to the great influx of 1966) and the GPCR led by Chairman Mao. He expressed the hope that PLA would establish new merits in the future.

It was inevitable that a new born organization like revolutionary committees will make some mistakes but these were not important and the revolutionary committees were a great creation. He repeated Chiang Ching's prediction that by the May Day there will be "basically revolutionary committees all over the country".

He joined Chiang Ching in criticising Yang Cheng Wu's article. He said that even then a soldier from Fukien had written a letter criticising the article, in which he had pointed out that Chairman's authority had already been established as a result of ~~many~~ arduous struggle by millions of people. Chairman Mao has summed up the rich revolutionary experience and when it had been grasped it became the invincible TMT. "We should be proud that a soldier dares to criticise the Chief of Staff".

Chou then discussed how revolution had been threatened at various times from the right and by the left. First it was the February adverse current of last year from the right headed by Tan Chen Lin. In summer the danger came from the other side - 'extreme left'. This year there was a re-emergence of danger from right opportunism and Yang Cheng Wu exemplified this. Chou En-lai also included a brief critical reference to Hsiao Hua.

He paid a fulsome tribute to Chiang Ching's contribution to revolution. She has been an outstanding student of Chairman Mao's right from the days of anti-Japanese war. In the face of great danger she carried out underground activities and wrote articles. Recently the 8 models she had established had laid the revolutionary guide lines for translation in the field of art and culture along Chairman Mao's line. Her February proposals when compared with Peng Chen February proposals show that her's were the right and his the black proposals. He informed the audience that the important editorial which appeared in

4 Liberation Army Daily in April 1966 was the work of Chiang Ching at the behest of Lin Biao. He warned the people again against collecting black material on Chiang Ching. This comes from Taiwan and Hong Kong. All those who collected this material in China will also be treated as counter revolutionaries. He credited Cultural Revolution Group with having exposed Wang, Huan and Chi.

He ended his speech by reiterating the tasks which lie ahead in the same terms as the Joint New Year Day Editorial of People's Daily, Red Flag and Liberation Army Daily, including the necessity for rectifying the party, Youth League and revolutionary rebel organizations.

( Please insert before the last paragraph on page 9 )

He also made the usual remarks about international situation and the difficulties facing the capitalists and revisionists. He went on to say: The enemies surrounding us including U.S. imperialist, Soviet revisionist, reactionaries etc. also may organise a large scale world war against us. Therefore we must be united and prepared for it.

Grasp revolution and promote production. You workers and peasants have a very heavy task. You have to carry out production. You should unite on the basis of TWT, You should not absent yourself from work and abandon production posts, or indulge in counter revolutionary activities or economism.

"Support the army and love the people". Refers to Chiang Ching's speech of 7th September.

22 April, 1968.

Dear John,

In his letter to Murray of 9 April, Percy Cradock said that the origins of the Yang Ch'eng-wu affair were obscure and that anything we said at that stage must be largely conjective.

2. I regret to say that the past fortnight has brought us no further enlightenment and we have nothing significant to add to the views in Percy Cradock's letter and mine to you of 9 April. The only real development, if it merits such a description, is the claim made to me by one of our Soviet colleagues that new posters had appeared denouncing Yeh Chien-ying as the man behind Yang Ch'eng-wu (as reported in our telegram No. 324). Whether or not such posters did reappear, it is quite certain that the attack has not been developed and the position of Yeh remains obscure as ever. We must now wait to see if he appears on May Day, and even this will be far from conclusive, one way or the other.

3. Yang Ch'eng-wu himself seems to have sunk without trace save for one story which is so flimsy that it hardly bears repeating. Two days ago a Czech colleague who has in the past often produced useful information, asked me what was "going on" between the Chinese and the North Vietnamese. After I had confessed ignorance - several times - he claimed that there were reports that Yang had gone to Hanoi. He ducked my questions about what Yang could be doing there but finally, with heavy emphasis, pointed out that the former Acting Chief of Staff had been in Korea with the Chinese People's Volunteers. I was left to gather the obvious inference. Perhaps I might link this, but with every possible reservation, with a report given to me today by Hans Bargmann, the West German correspondent who has just returned from a visit to Hong Kong, where he talked to a communist official named Ma (who he believes is the editor of the Ta Kung Pao). According to Bargmann, Ma said that "in his opinion" China could never allow Comrade Ho Chi-minh to make peace with the Americans and that if necessary, every kind of assistance would be given to Vietnamese patriots who were ready to continue the war. It seems likely that both stories have been directed towards the West for obvious political purposes and neither may have any close relationship with hard fact.

4. To return to Chinese internal affairs. Although the national and the provincial Chinese press has devoted a very great deal of space to the American negroes' "struggle" since Mao's statement of 16 April, it has also pegged away at its defence of and advice to revolutionary committees, developing the various points made in the editorial of 30 March (our telegram No. 264). Other favourite themes have been calls for people to be on their guard against "rightist splittism, opportunism and conservatism", to carry on the great criticism and to dig out and strike down the "traitors and special agents" who allegedly continue to be buried in society. All these lines are only too familiar and tend to confirm the impression that the revolution has all but run out of steam. It seems likely that one of the subsidiary aims of the hullabaloo about the negro struggle, was to give a fillip to flagging revolutionary spirits (the major aims, as discussed by Leonard Appleyard in another letter in this bag were related to the Vietnamese question). The main objective of the leadership at present seems to be to complete its tally of revolutionary committees as quickly as possible and with the minimum of fuss.

I am copying this letter to Frank Brewer in J.R.D. Colin Wilson in I.R.D., Denison Cross in D.I.S., McKearney in P.U.S.D., George Walden and Ashworth in Hong Kong, Reg Hibbert in Singapore, Roy Spendlove in Washington and Peter Hewitt in Canberra.

CHINA: QUALITATIVE DISTINCTIONS WITHIN THE PLA.

1. Chargé's Office in Peking has raised a query with regard to the meaning of "local troops" and "independent" units (PEK/7 dated 7 May 68). FC 1/3. (13)
2. We believe that a qualitative distinction can be drawn, in broad terms, between Field Armies and Military District troops. These could be described respectively as the 'Field Force' and the 'Local' or 'Regional' Force. We also believe that a further distinction can be drawn within Field Armies in that some divisions appear to have a higher degree of operational readiness than others. There are also a number of independent divisions, which are probably of higher quality than Military District troops, but which, in general, could probably be best described as belonging to the Local or Regional Force.
3. The fact that there is a distinction between the Field Force and the Local or Regional Force is not new, since Mao has said that: "This Army (PLA) is powerful because of its division into two parts, the Main Forces and the Regional Forces, with the former available for operations in any region whenever necessary and the latter concentrating on the defence of their own localities and attacking the enemy there in co-operation with the local Militia and the Self-Defence Corps".
4. The movement of divisions to the Fukien Front from other parts of China in 1962, and similar types of movement during the Cultural Revolution, may be said to provide practical examples of the fact that the quality of the PLA Ground Force is uneven, in that the moves suggest to us either that there were no forces of high quality within a particular area or that they were insufficiently representative of the forces already there.

SITUATION IN CHINA

I HAD OPPORTUNITY OVER WEEKEND FOR BRIEF TALK WITH MINAILO SHARANOVICH WHO HAS BEEN YUGOSLAV NEWS AGENCY CORRESPONDENT IN PEKING SINCE LATE 1965. HE IS ON GOOD TERMS WITH DAVID OANCIA WHO ARRANGED MTG.

2. TO MY SURPRISE SHARANOVICH BEGAN BY SAYING HE DID NOT/NOT AGREE WITH CURRENT POPULAR INTERPRETATION OF MANOEUVRES WITHIN LEADERSHIP IN PEKING. AS YOU KNOW, IT IS NOW MORE OR LESS ACCEPTED BY OBSERVERS BOTH IN PEKING AND HKONG THAT DISMISSAL OF YANG CHENG-WU AS ACTING CHIEF OF STAFF AT END OF MAR WAS COUNTER-ATTACK BY RADICALS AMONG LEADERSHIP AIMED AT HALTING TREND TOWARDS GREATER MILITARY CONTROL AND CREATION WITHIN FRAMEWORK OF PROVINCIAL REVOLUTIONARY CTTEES OF NEW ELITE OF MILITARY LEADERS AND VETERAN CADRES. SHARANOVICH HOWEVER HELD TO INITIAL ASSESSMENT THAT ATTACK ON YANG HAD BEEN CONTINUATION OF EARLIER ATTACKS AGAINST EXTREME LEFT AND HAD REPRESENTED ESSENTIALLY NEW VICTORY FOR COALITION OF CIVILIAN PRAGMATISTS AND ARMY MODERATES IN PEKING AND FURTHER DEFEAT FOR MORE RADICAL CULTURAL REVLN GROUP.

Not accepted by me (in this form at least)

3. ACCORDING TO SHARANOVICH THERE HAD BEEN EVIDENCE TO LINK YANG CHENG-WU WITH EXTREME LEFTISTS WANG LI AND KUANG

4. SHARANOVICH ARGUED THEREFORE THAT THERE HAD NOT/NOT BEEN SHIFT TO LEFT IN PAST TWO MONTHS AS COMMONLY BELIEVED AND THAT ON CONTRARY MODERATES AND PRAGMATISTS CONTINUED TO CONSOLIDATE THEIR POSITION. CULTURAL REVOLUTIONARY GROUP WAS INCREASINGLY LESS POWERFUL. IT HAD ONLY FIVE PROMINENT MEMBERS NOW COMPARED WITH EARLIER FIGURE OF APPROX 20. MOREOVER THERE WERE INDICATIONS CHEN PO-TA MIGHT HAVE BEEN BEHIND YANG AND PROPOSED ARMY PURGE AND AS RESULT HIS POSITION SEEMED SHAKY. IT WAS TRUE THAT CULTURAL REVOLUTIONARY GROUP HAD MADE GAINS IN MAY DAY LISTS BUT THIS WAS EPHEMERAL THING. MORE IMPORTANT WAS NUMBER OF MILITARY LEADERS WHO HAD ATTENDED CELEBRATIONS. EVEN OLD MARSHALS HAD PUT IN APPEARANCE. THERE WAS TENDENCY TO OVERRATE POWER AND INFLUENCE OF CHIANG CHING BECAUSE SHE WAS MAOS WIFE.

5. SHARANOVICH WENT ON TO DESCRIBE MAO AS LESS AND LESS A PROMINENT FIGURE. THERE HAD BEEN QUOTE SOMETHING ODD UNQUOTE ABOUT HIS APPEARANCE AT MAY DAY CELEBRATIONS. IF HE DIED IT WAS LIKELY THAT LEADERSHIP WOULD NOT/NOT ANNOUNCE IT IMMEDIATELY BECAUSE IT WOULD LEAD TO QUOTE CIVIL WAR UNQUOTE. THEY WOULD HAVE TO WORK THINGS OUT AMONG THEMSELVES FIRST.

6. SHARANOVICH DID NOT/NOT AGREE WITH OANCIA'S BELIEF THAT

Important speeches by Chiang Ching, Kang Sheng, Chen Po Ta and Chou En-lai delivered on 27th March.

Speeches delivered by the leaders to a <sup>100,000</sup>~~200,00,000~~ strong mixed audience of PLA, Red Guards, workers, peasants, teachers and students:

Chen Po Tai Premier Chou will read out the instructions of the Party Centre and orders of Chairman Mao and Vice Chairman Lin.

Chou En-lai read out the following decision of the Central Committee, State Council, Military Affairs Commission and Cultural Revolution Group dated 22 March 1968:

According to the decision of Chairman Mao and Vice Chairman Lin:

(i) Yang Cheng Wu has committed exceedingly serious mistakes and therefore it is decided to dismiss him from posts of Acting Chief of Staff, Standing Committee of Military Affairs Commission, Secretary General, Military Affairs Commission and First Secretary, General Staff Department.

(ii) Fu Li Chin has committed exceedingly serious mistakes. Furthermore he is a renegade. He is dismissed from his posts of the Political Commissar, Air Force and Second Secretary, Party Committee Air Force.

(iii) Fu Chung Pi has made serious mistakes and is dismissed as Commander, Peking Garrison Communist Command.

This decision is to be communicated to all fighters and commanders.

Speech by Chiang Ching: To-day's meeting is being held because some comrades wanted us to explain something and we also wanted to tell them something. International and internal situation is excellent. Imperialists, revisionists and reactionaries are confronted by a financial crisis. In name it is a financial crisis, in reality it involves rising prices, depreciating value of currency, hoarding, shut-down of factories etc. . Isnt the fact that life has become difficult for imperialists, revisionists and reactionaries to our advantage? (Audience: Yes!) They are They are day by day approaching a disastrous exit. And we? Let us not speak of something distant. Let us just speak of the situation since we entered the cultural revolution. Our currency has been stable. Basic living standards and prices have been stable. In agriculture we had a bumper harvest last year. In industry there were several inventions. Naturally in some places fighting led to a decline in production. But the moment revolutionary great alliance and revolutionary 3-way alliance were achieved, production quickly shot up and production targets were exceeded. Isn't this an excellent situation? (Hsieh Fu Chi: Long Live the victory of Chairman Mao's proletarian revolutionary line! Long live GPCR!) Our life is improving day by day. Things Needs fear comparison. Comrades should compare these two situations a little. Isn't it excellent?

The situation in GPCR is also excellent. 18 provinces and cities already have revolutionary committees. Another 4 provinces are soon awaiting central ratification. Rest are in the process of fermentation and will come to Peking for solution. Before May Day, basically (sic) every province will have established revolutionary committee....

We must firmly oppose those who do not accept that the situation is excellent and seek to paint it in black colours. The GPCR situation in Peking is excellent. Some people say that the revolution in Shanghai is in a better situation than in Peking. This is concrete analysis. Each has its good and bad points. We cannot say that such and such place is better than Peking, or that Peking is better than such and such place. We cannot speak in such an absolute terms. The excellent situation in Peking manifests itself in the fact that the working class and poor and lower-middle peasants can already manage the situation of revolutionary struggle (Ye Chun: Consolidate the Red regional revolutionary committees! Consolidate Peking revolutionary committee! Defend the party Centre led by Chairman Mao!) Strengthen the pillar of proletarian dictatorship - PLA. Firmly support Chiang Ching's "5th September" decision!)

Comrades, I am an ordinary party member.... (She then goes on to indulge in a display of modesty, interspersed by elegances led by Ye Chun and Hsieh Fu Chi calling for learning from and protecting Chiang Ching)... There is no one who is consistently correct all his life. I certainly am not such a person. I too have made mistakes and still have shortcomings. If I make a mistake, comrades can bombard me and write posters about me. Some institutes say "fry" me, "execute" me. When I have spare time I go there to see they "fry" me (laughter).... Chiang Ching then goes on to discuss double dealers, flatterers and points out that with respect to them there is usually a "process of recognition" (Translator's note: That is, they are only gradually recognised and discovered as such), particularly we who work at the side of Chairman Mao cannot arbitrarily suspect a person. It needs very close investigation...

~~SECRET~~ the nature of a bad

Before we can discover another ~~bad~~ <sup>to</sup> thing we have <sup>to</sup> examine it in all sorts of circumstances. ~~Examination~~. This was true also in cases of such renegades, counter revolutionaries and double faced careerists who wormed their way into the party as Lio Tang Tao, Peng Te Hui, Ho Lung, Peng, Lu, <sup>to</sup> and Yang (Ye Chun: Down with Hsiao Hua) (Hsieh: Down with Wang, Kuan and Chi). If there had not been a GPCR, they could never have been exposed. This is a great merit achieved by revolutionary young fighters....

(On "February adverse current"...)...

Last February, ~~when~~ the black general renegade Tan Chen Lin as representative, it emerged to <sup>reverse the</sup> ~~verdict~~ on Lio Tang Tao. Since this struggle took place in a very small circle the broad masses did not know. Therefore they with ulterior motives exploit this to mislead revolutionary young fighters, revolutionary masses, reversing black and white and saying: "Whoever opposes Yu Chin Li xx, xx, is opposing the Premier and opposing Chairman Mao". In fact Yu Chin Li is (was ?) a confidante of Ho Lung. Chairman Mao says that you must (i) criticise and (ii) protect. We are still acting accordingly. But revolutionary fighters should not allow themselves to be cheated by him. This spearhead of the 'February adverse current' was primarily directed against the proletarian headquarters headed by Chairman Mao and Lin, PLA, the newly born revolutionary committees. It opposed the GPCR and refused to accept the achievements of GPCR, that is, refused to accept the achievements of revolutionary masses and revolutionary young fighters. Under the leadership of Chairman and Vice Chairman Lin, we crushed them and thoroughly exposed them.

Ye Chun: Down with the black claws of Lio and <sup>Teng</sup> ~~Tan~~ Wang, Kuan and Chi. They wave to oppose red flags, <sup>to oppose</sup> ~~opposing~~ red flags and went about practising <sup>deception</sup> ~~disruption~~. They did not ask for instructions, did not report to us, blockaded us (that is, kept information away from us) and maliciously sought to bring evil up on us. Because they ~~black~~ claws therefore ~~we~~ dealt with them. We would not permit them to disturb Chairman Mao's <sup>affair</sup> ~~great~~ strategic plan. But some people exploit this sort of ~~fact~~ <sup>affair</sup> to negate the victories of the GPCR, to negate revolutionary masses and the merits of revolutionary young fighters.

(Ye Chun:Defend to death C.R.group. Guard against the plotting activities of February adverse current. Down with Tan Chen Lin) Since they waved the red flag to oppose the red flag they were able to fool certain number of masses. Because of this we adopted a very cautious policy towards them, the policy of division. Wang and Kuan could not be separated. Chi Pen Yu's mode of operation was not identical and therefore we separated him for a period of time. But to separate him did not mean that there were no problems in relation to him. In the event in the latter half of last year he became even more frenzied and many improper things took place.. We, internally, carried out a series of principled struggles with him. My last November speech at the art and culture forum, was in fact meant to be a criticism of Chi without mentioning him by name. He colluded with Yang ChMeng Wu, their collusions started very early. We did not know about it. Chi also colluded with Yu Li Chin and Fu Chung Pi. They incited the masses and said that bad people had emerged in the cultural revolution group. They did this in order to negate the cultural revolution group. Furthermore all these bad eggs were dealt with by the cultural revolution group itself. (Chen Po Ta: By Chiang Ching. The Premier and other leaders agreed with Chen Po Ta) I feel that all the merit should not be attributed to any person. It should go to our great leader Chairman Mao, to revolutionary masses, to PLA.

Yang Cheng Wu wrote an article entitled "Establish in a thorough going way the absolute authority of Chairman Mao and of his great thought". I oppose this article on two occasions in accordance with Chairman Mao's instructions. But he would not listen and insisted on publishing it. In fact what he wanted to establish was his own absolute authority. He was a double faced plotter who set up a very small mountain strong hold of his own instead of the big strong hold of China... On 8th March he supported Fu Chung Pi in organising a wanton armed intrusion on two vehicles into the premises of the cultural revolution group without the permission of the cultural revolution group. We firmly oppose this and seriously criticised him. From that day on, Yang suddenly said that he was ill. In fact, behind our backs, he daily held meetings, daily hatched plots. He wanted to capture power in the air force. Yu Li Chin wanted to use him to seize comrade Wu Fa Hsien's power....

The Peking University has two militant organisations. They wrote a letter to Chairman Mao, Vice Chairman Lin and us. At that time we were holding a meeting. I did not receive it. I entrusted comrade Hsieh to go and get this letter. But....

something strange happened. Fu Chung Pi sent a man called xxx to the Peking University to get "to the bottom of it" collecting name lists, looking for behind the scene bosses etc. This was improper. In this way they seized the right of the revolutionary masses to transmit material to Chairman Mao, Lin Biao and cultural revolution group. That evening or next, comrade Nieh rang us up agitatedly to inform us of the crisis. We were already very tired, but we still went and met her. She reported on the situation to Chen Po Ta and me. I explained to her what I wanted. But that we did not know what had happened below. At the same time we frankly <sup>stated</sup> ~~heard~~ the facts and that Wang, Kuan and Chi <sup>were</sup> ~~are~~ black claws and did not deserve such a fuss. <sup>if</sup> ~~However~~ she acted in this way <sup>would</sup> ~~with~~ that not impede the general direction, <sup>but</sup> she still carried out one battle(?) Nieh has shortcomings and has made mistakes. You should criticise her but also protect her.

To reverse the verdict of on the February adverse current is evil. Tan Chen Lin is a renegade. I protected him in the past. But now I say "Down with Tan Chen Lin! He is a black general of Lio and Tang. <sup>clear</sup> ~~Now~~ we have ~~here~~ proof that he is a renegade".

olution-
In the history of our party, in the struggle between 2 lines, there has always been left deviationist adventurism as well as right conservatism. Today it is right conservatism and right ~~superstition~~ <sup>opportunism</sup> which has acquired prominence among the revolutionaries. We must crush it. All the bad people I have discussed above had a common objective - to bring about capitalist restoration. Concretely they sought in vain to wreck the proletarian <sup>headquarters</sup> headed by Chairman Mao, and Vice Chairman Lin. (Chiang Ching then goes on to pay fulsome tributes to the PLA and at that stage Wu Pu Hsien led the audience in slogans pledging loyalty to Chairman Mao, Lin Biao, Chiang Ching, Cultural Revolution Group etc.)

Chiang Ching then went on to make the standard remarks about the necessity of distinguishing between friends and enemies and about the necessity of raising one's vigilance. She concluded with a series of slogans which included the following in that order:

Long Live the Red Guards!

Long Live the PLA!

Speech of Long Shang: I fully support the decisions of Party Centre announced by the Premier which are based on the brilliant instructions of Chairman Mao and Vice Chairman Lin Biao, that is the dismissal of Yang Cheng Wu and Fu Chung Pi and the dealing according to law(?)
with Yu Li Chin.

Echoing Chiang Ching's view that with respect to double dealers there is a process of recognition, Kang Sheng goes on to say: "We did not previously see the true nature of Yang, Yu and Fu.... But in the course of the cultural revolution many facts emerged to prove that Yang Cheng Wu was a double dealer. As Vice Chairman Lin has pointed out, his opposition to Lo Jui Ching was false and in reality he was a Lo's man. His opposition to Peng, Lu, Lo and Yang was false. In reality he was a confidante of Peng Chen. His opposition to Ho Lung was false. In reality as far back as Yenan times, he was a bosom friend of Ho Lung. Now he wants to seize the power of the PLA and the air force. He pretended to oppose Wang, Kuan and Chi but in fact was their behind the scene boss. He was collecting black material on Chiang Ching along with Chi Pen Yu. He ordered Fu Chung Pi to break into the premises of cultural revolution group. In collusion with Yu Li Chin, he sought to over throw Wu Pu Hsien and grab power in the air force. In collaboration with Fu Chung Pi he sought to over throw Vice Premier Hsieh and grab power in Peking Revolutionary Committee. He sought to capture the Radio Station, the Liberation Army Daily and the People's Daily and this is only what we have discovered upto now. I suspect that you comrades will later be able to expose even bigger problems.

Liow/Teng line No matter what tricks he used his ultimate objective was to reverse the ~~past~~ verdicts on the ~~Liu-Teng-Lin~~, on Liu Teng and Tao, Peng Te Hsai, Lo Jui Ching, Ho Lung, Peng, Lu, Lo and Yang and on the February adverse current of ~~of~~ Tan Chen Lin.

Kang Sheng then proceeds to elaborate further what Chiang Ching had said on the February adverse current. He says: They attacked the Head and Deputy Head of Cultural Revolution Group, Chen Po Ta and Chiang Ching. Particularly clear was their opposition to the Yenan rectification movement led by Chairman Mao... They slandered DMT as being ~~metaphysical~~ "metaphysical" and GPCR as "lacking party leadership". They pretended to protect old cadres and their relatives but in fact under that guise they protected those ghosts and monsters, the capitalist roaders... They fooled a few people, particularly the youth to serve their anti-party clique.... They wished to reverse the verdict even on that running dog of Soviet revisionism Wang Ming. However, there had been no Yenan rectification, then, there would have been no victory in the war of liberation..

DMT tells us that the basic question of the revolution is the question of power. We must be on our guard against the "extreme left" and even more so against the extreme right, who wish to shake the proletarian headquarters, the PLA

and the new revolutionary committees.

Referring to how some people used the attacks on Wang, Kuan and Chi to attack proletarian headquarters and the cultural revolution group, Kang Sheng went on to say: "What sort of a person was Wang Li? - a KMT man, and an activist carrying out the policy of "SAN HO YI SHAO" of Teng Hsiao Ping and Wang Chia Hsiang. In 1962, in Moscow, he carried out the Lin-Teng line of "SAN HO YI SHAO", and was praised and awarded for this by Khrushchev. And what about Kuan Peng and Chi Pen Yu? They were confidantes of Peng Cheng. Peng Cheng used to invite Chi Pen Yu to dinner and Chi Pen Yu used in turn/praise Peng Cheng. This inside story we were not aware of before. It was exposed during the cultural revolution, particularly by Chiang Ching.

Praising the PLA, Kang Sheng claims: Pulling out of Yang Yu and Fu is a great triumph and merit of the PLA. Therefore we must guard against anybody exploiting this incident to turn the spearhead against the PLA.

Speaking about the revolutionary committees, Kang Sheng says that such bad people as Fu Chung Pi and Chou Ching Pang, must certainly be pulled out. But this must not be used to attack the new red regimes - the revolutionary committees.

Kang Sheng ends his speech by calling upon his audience to raise their vigilance and not to assume that all double dealers, plotters and careerists have been over thrown. "So long as class struggle exists, a handful of counter revolutionaries will exist".

Speech by Shen Fa Tai We have had five major struggles in the course of the Cultural Revolution against the following:

- (i) Peng, Lu, Lo and Yang
- (ii) Lin, Teng and Tao
- (iii) February adverse current headed by Tan Chen Lin and co.
- (iv) Wang, Kuan and Chi, and now against
- (v) Yang, Yu and Fu at a time when Cultural Revolution is moving towards all round victory

CHEN HUI-LAI He expressed his support for the above decision and speeches. He denounced mountain strong-holdism and sectarianism and pointed out that such tendencies were harmful to the party, PLA etc. His remarks appear to have been directed to the PLA members of the audience. He pointed out that Yang Cheng We had taken the same road as Pang Te Hui and Lo Jui Ching and he had to fall in the same way. He expressed the belief that only a small minority in the PLA were with Yang, Yu and Pu and called upon them to wake up and draw a clear line of ~~distinction~~ demarcation between themselves and this clique. He emphasised the great role which PLA had played particularly in the course of GPCR. He went out of his way to praise theeking Garrison Command who had looked after and protected 13 million Red Guards (Translator's note: probably reference to the great influx of 1966) and the GPCR led by Chairman Mao. He expressed the hope that PLA would establish new merits in the future.

It was inevitable that a new born organisation like revolutionary committee will make some mistakes but these were not important and the revolutionary committees were a great creation. He repeated Chiang Ching's prediction that by the May Day there will be "basically revolutionary committees all over the country".

He joined Chiang Ching in criticising Yang Cheng Wu's article. He said that even then a soldier from Fukien had written a letter criticising the article, in which he had pointed out that Chairman's authority had already been established as a result of ~~many~~ arduous struggle by millions of people. Chairman Mao has summed up the rich revolutionary experience and when it had been grasped it became the invincible EMT. "We should be proud that a soldier dares to criticise the Chief of Staff".

Chou then discussed ~~the~~ how revolution had been threatened at various times from the right and by the left. First it was the February adverse current of last year from the right headed by Tan Chen Lin. In summer the danger came from the other side - 'extreme left! This year there was a re-emergence of danger from right ~~opportunism~~ opportunism and Yang Cheng Wu exemplified this. Chou En-lai also included a brief critical reference to Hsiao Hua.

He paid a fulsome tribute to Chiang Ching's contribution to revolution. She has been an outstanding student of Chairman Mao's right from the days of anti-Japanese war. In the face of great danger she carried out underground activities and wrote articles. Recently the 8 models she had established had laid the revolutionary guide lines for ~~translation~~ in the field of art and culture along Chairman Mao's line. Her February/ proposals when compared with Peng Chen February proposals show that her's were the right and his the black proposals. He informed the audience that the important editorial which appeared in Liberation Army Daily in April 1966 was the work of Chiang Ching at the behest of Lin Piao. He warned the people against collecting black material on Chiang Ching. This comes from Taiwan and Hong Kong. All those who collected this material in China will also be treated as counter revolutionaries. He credited Cultural Revolution Group with having exposed Wang, Kuan and Chi.

He also made the usual remarks about international situation and the difficulties facing the capitalists and revisionists. He went on to say: The enemies surrounding us including U.S. imperialist, Soviet revisionist, reactionaries etc. also may organise a large scale world war against us. Therefore we must be united and prepared for it.

Grasp revolution and promote production. You workers and peasants have a very heavy task. You have to carry out production. You should unite on the basis of TNTT. You should not absent yourself from work and abandon production posts, or indulge in counter revolutionary activities or economism.

"Support the army and love the people". Refers to Chiang Ching's speech of 5th September.

He ended his speech by reiterating the tasks which lie ahead in the same terms as the Joint New Year Day Editorial of People's Daily, Red Flag and Liberation Army Daily, including the necessity for rectifying the party, Youth League and revolutionary rebel organisations.

Important speeches by Chiang Ching, Kang Sheng, Chen Po Ta and Chen En-lai delivered on 27th March.

Speeches delivered by the leaders to a <sup>100,000.00</sup>~~200,000.00~~ strong mixed audience of PLA, Red Guards, workers, peasants, teachers and students.

Chen En-lai Premier Chen will read out the instructions of the Party Centre and orders of Chairman Mao and Vice Chairman Lin.

Chen En-lai read out the following decision of the Central Committee, State Council, Military Affairs Commission and Cultural Revolution Group dated 22 March 1968:

According to the decision of Chairman Mao and Vice Chairman Lin:

(i) Yang Cheng Wu has committed exceedingly serious mistakes and therefore it is decided to dismiss him from posts of Acting Chief of Staff, Standing Committee of Military Affairs Commission, Secretary General, Military Affairs Commission and First Secretary, General Staff Department.

(ii) Xu Li Chin has committed exceedingly serious mistakes. Furthermore he is a renegade. He is dismissed from his posts of the Political Commissar, Air Force and Second Secretary, Party Committee Air Force.

(iii) Fu Chung Pi has made serious mistakes and is dismissed as Commander, Peking Garrison Command.

This decision is to be communicated to all fighters and commanders.

Speech by Chiang Ching To-day's meeting is being held because some comrades wanted us to explain something and we also wanted to tell them something. International and internal situation is excellent. Imperialists, revisionists and reactionaries are confronted by a financial crisis. In name it is a financial crisis, in reality it involves rising prices, depreciating value of currency, hoarding, shut-down of factories etc. . Isnt the fact that life has become difficult for imperialists, revisionists and reactionaries to our advantage? (Audience: Yes!) They are They are day by day approaching a disastrous exit. And we? Let us not speak of something distant. Let us just speak of the situation since we entered the cultural revolution. Our currency has been stable. Basic living standards and prices have been stable. In agriculture we had a bumper harvest last year. In industry there were several inventions. Naturally in some places fighting led to a decline in production. But the recent revolutionary great alliance and revolutionary 3-way alliance were achieved, production quickly shot up and production targets were exceeded. Isn't this an excellent situation? (Hsieh Fu Chi: Long Live the victory of Chairman Mao's proletarian revolutionary line! Long live GPCR!) Our life is improving day by day. Things fear comparison. Comrades should compare these two situations a little. Isn't it excellent?

The situation in GPCR is also excellent. 18 provinces and cities already have revolutionary committees. Another 4 provinces are awaiting central ratification. Rest are in the process of fermentation and will come to Peking for solution. Before May Day, basically (sic) every province will have established revolutionary committee.....

We must firmly oppose those who do not accept that the situation is excellent and seek to paint it in black colours. The GPCR situation in Peking is excellent. Some people say that the revolution in Shanghai is in a better situation than in Peking. This lacks concrete analysis. Each has its good and bad points. We cannot say that such and such place is better than Peking, or that Peking is better than such and such place. We cannot speak in such absolute terms. The excellent situation in Peking manifests itself in the fact that the working class and poor and lower-middle peasants can already manage the situation of revolutionary struggle (Yo Chun: Consolidate the Red regimes revolutionary committees: Consolidate Peking revolutionary committee! Defend the party Centre led by Chairman Mao! Strengthen the pillar of proletarian dictatorship-PLA. Firmly support Chiang Ching's "5th September" decision!)

Comrades, I am an ordinary party member.....(She then goes on to indulge in a display of modesty, interspersed by slogans led by Yo Chun and Hsieh Fu Chi calling for learning from and protecting Chiang Ching)... There is no one who is consistently correct all his life. I certainly am not such a person. I too have made mistakes and still have shortcomings. If I make a mistake, comrades can bombard me and write posters about me. Some institutes say "fry" me, "execute" me. When I have spare times I go there to see they "fry" me (laughter).... Echoing Chiang Ching's view that with respect to double dealers there is a process of recognition, Kang Sheng goes on to say: "We did not previously see the true nature of Yang, Yu and Fu.... Kang Sheng then proceeds to elaborate further what Chiang Ching had said on the February adverse current. He says: They attacked the Head and Deputy Head of Cultural Revolution Group, Chen Po Ta and Chiang Ching. Particularly clear was their opposition to the Yenan rectification movement led by Chairman Mao... They slandered TWT as being ~~metaphysical~~ "metaphysical" and CPCR as "lacking party leadership". TWT tells us that the basic question of the revolution is the question of power. We must be on our guard against the "extreme left" and even more so against the extreme right, who wish to shake the proletarian headquarters, the PLA

Referring to how some people used the attacks on Wang, Kuan and Chi to attack proletarian headquarters and the cultural revolution group, Kang Sheng went on to say: "What sort of a person was Wang Li? - a KMT man, and an activist carrying out the policy of 'SAN HO YI SHAO' of Teng Hsiao Ping and Wang Chia Hsiang. Praising the PLA, Kang Sheng claims: Pulling out of Yang Yu and Fu is a great triumph and merit of the PLA. Therefore we must guard against anybody exploiting this incident to turn the spearhead against the PLA.

Speaking about the revolutionary committees, Kang Sheng says that such bad people as Fu Chung Pi and Chou Ching Fang, must certainly be pulled out. But this must not be used to attack the new red regimes - the revolutionary committees.

Kang Sheng ends his speech by calling upon his audience to raise their vigilance and not to assume that all double dealers, plotters and careerists have been overthrown. "So long as class struggle exists, a handful of counter revolutionaries will exist".

Speech by Chou En-Lai We have had five major struggles in the course of the Cultural Revolution against the following:

- (i) Peng, Lu, Lo and Yang
- (ii) Lin, Teng and Zhao
- (iii) February adverse current headed by Tan Chen Lin and co.
- (iv) Wang, Kuan and Chi, and now against
- (v) Yang, Yu and Fu at a time when Cultural Revolution is moving towards all round victory

Speech by Chou En-Lai He expressed his support for the above decision and speeches. He pointed out that Yang Cheng Wu had taken the same road as Peng Te Hui and Ho Jui Ching and he had to fall in the same way. He expressed the belief that only a small

He joined Chiang Ching in criticising Yang Cheng Wu's article. He said that even then a soldier from Fukien had written a letter criticising the article, in which he had pointed out that Chairman's authority had already been established as a result of arduous struggle by millions of people. Chairman Mao has summed up the rich revolutionary experience and when it had been grasped it became the invincible TMTT. "We should be proud that a soldier dares to criticise the Chief of Staff".

Chou then discussed how revolution had been threatened at various times from the right and by the left. First it was the February adverse current of last year from the right headed by Tan Chen Lin. In summer the danger came from the other side-"extreme left! This year there was a re-emergence of danger from right opportunism and Yang Cheng Wu exemplified this. Chou En-lai also included a brief critical reference to Hsiao Hua.

He paid a fulsome tribute to Chiang Ching's contribution to revolution. She has been an outstanding student of Chairman Mao right from the days of anti-Japanese war. In the face of great danger she carried out underground activities and wrote articles. Recently the 8 models she had established had laid the revolutionary guide lines for transformation in the field of art and culture along Chairman Mao's line. Her February proposals when compared with Peng Chen February proposals show that her's were the red and his the black proposals. He informed the audience that the important editorial which appeared

Liberation Army Daily in April 1966 was the work of Chiang Ching at the behest of Lin Biao. He warned the people against collecting black material on Chiang Ching. This comes from Taiwan and Hong Kong. All those who collected this material in China will also be treated as counter revolutionaries. He credited Cultural Revolution Group with having exposed Wang, Kuan and Chi.

He also made the usual remarks about international situation and the difficulties facing the capitalists and revisionists. He went on to say: The enemies surrounding us including U.S. imperialist, Soviet revisionist, reactionaries etc. also may organise a large scale world war against us. Therefore we must be united and prepared for it.

Grasp revolution and promote production. You workers and peasants have a very heavy task. You have to carry out production. You should unite on the basis of TNTT. You should not absent yourself from work and abandon production posts, or indulge in counter revolutionary activities or economism.

"Support the army and love the people". Refers to Chiang Ching's speech of 5th September.

He ended his speech by reiterating the tasks which lie ahead in the same terms as the Joint New Year Day Editorial of People's Daily, Red Flag and Liberation Army Daily, including the necessity for rectifying the party, Youth League and revolutionary rebel organisations.

Dear John,

China has found a new hero. Joining the pantheon of Chang Szu-teh, Lei Feng and the rest we now have Men Ho, who was formerly the Deputy Political Instructor of the Second Battalion of the Fourth Regiment of a unit in Tsinghai Military District. On 28 May the People's Daily announced that Mao and Lin had personally approved a decision by the Central Committee of the CCP, the Military Affairs Committee and the Cultural Revolution Group to confer on Men Ho the title of "good cadre, boundlessly loyal to Chairman Mao's revolutionary line".

2. In keeping with the Chinese tradition that the best (safest ?) heroes are dead ones, the award was posthumous. Men blew himself up when working on the Pa Ts'ang state farm in Tsinghai. He was killed by a locally-made rocket which was intended to be used to disperse clouds and prevent hail storms (which would seem to be a relatively advanced agricultural technique for Tsinghai). Although the announcement of the award said it had been made "recently", in fact the incident occurred on 5 September 1967 which, fortuitously enough, was the 23rd anniversary of the day that Chang Szu-teh himself "laid down his life for the people". It appears that the leadership needed some time for reflection before deciding to canonize Comrade Men. Posters describing Men's exploits had already appeared in Peking by 22 May and since the first announcement in the People's Daily a massive press campaign has been in progress throughout the country. The PLA, in particular, have launched an emulation campaign and have composed songs, plays and articles lauding the achievements of their late colleague. A book on the life of Men Ho was published on 2 June.

3. Some Peking observers believe that there is nothing of special significance behind this campaign. They point out that it has provided copious material with which newspaper editors are able to fill their columns at a time when there is little of interest to report. The rate of progress in creating the last batch of revolutionary committees is painfully slow and it is fairly clear that, even in the Chinese press, the theme of the "revolutionary great criticism" cannot be maintained all the time. Some cynics also claim that Men Ho has been produced at this time simply as part of the normal process of replenishment of the stock of revolutionary heroes. However, the scale of the treatment accorded to Men Ho suggests that the reasons for the campaign go somewhat deeper than this.

4. The most outstanding characteristic of Men was his alleged devotion to Mao. He is presented as a model of a new generation of communists who has brought this devotion to a new peak. The country is now asked to follow Men Ho's pledge of the "Four Everythings" (ssu-ko yi ch'ieh) - "Think of Chairman Mao at all times, obey him under all circumstances, closely follow him at all events and do everything for him". An interesting article on page 4 of the People's Daily of 31 May was prepared to concede that throughout Chinese history in the past there had been other heroes who were prepared to risk death or to suffer but emphasises that it is only Men Ho who did so for selfless love of Mao.

5. We are asked to believe that Men Ho showed his courage not only in battle (he had "seen action in the war years") or when handling grenades or faulty rockets, but in all aspects of his life. Men joined the Party in 1947 and the PLA in 1948. Inevitably, throughout his service he followed Mao and resisted the bourgeois military line of P'eng Teh-huai and Lo Jui-ch'ing. It is reported, for example, (NCNA 053104 of 1 June) that in 1957 he denounced the "foreign stereotypes" which undermined the traditions of the PLA and that when training his squad he did not first teach them military affairs or skills but made them read Mao's "Serve the People". Men also took an active interest in political and cultural affairs. It is alleged that in 1961 he was shocked to hear of the revisionist scheme of "China's Khrushchev" to carry out the 'san tzu yi pad' (the increase of private plots, free markets and small enterprises and the fixing of output quotas on the basis of households) in the agricultural sector and, recognising that "the army did not live in isolation", encouraged the men under his command to write letters to their families urging them to oppose such revisionist heresy. He also criticised plays on "feudal and capitalist themes" and organised his men in singing, acting and writing plays with appropriate revolutionary themes. It is recorded (NCNA 053104) that when one soldier suggested that he should concentrate on military skills rather than on singing and acting Men Ho reminded him of Chiang Ch'ing's exhortation - "Never look down upon literature and art! We should hold not only guns but pens too".

6. Men Ho's conduct in the Cultural Revolution had, of course, been exemplary. He responded positively to Chairman Mao's call to "Support the broad masses of the left". Having studied the situation in Tsinghai he came to realise that the 18 August Group was made up of proletarian revolutionaries and hence supported them unswervingly against the handful of capitalist-roaders in the province.

7. On the evidence of the material which has appeared so far, the main message of the Men Ho campaign seems to be directed at Chinese cadres, both military and civilian. The military must always be ready to concern themselves with civil affairs and to give active support to the "broad masses of the left". Civilian cadres must courageously stand forward and play their part in the revolution. All must be infinitely loyal to Mao. They must "unite with all the people who can be united" but carry out an uncompromising attack on the class enemy".

8. Many previous press articles have indicated that cadres continue to be reluctant to "stand forward" again after the buffeting they have received during the Cultural Revolution and there is, therefore, nothing particularly new about this aspect of the Men Ho campaign. Perhaps the most interesting implication is that it is still necessary to exhort the military to involve themselves in the Cultural Revolution and the support of the left. It is another indication that Lin Piao may well be having difficulty in getting the PLA to follow him in wholehearted subservience to the Macist line.

9. What seems to be an interesting by-product of the Men Ho campaign has been the appearance in Peking during the last few days of more posters attacking Nieh Jung-chen. He is accused of having oppressed the 18 August Group in Tsinghai. We have no details of these accusations but it may be that there are organisations controlled by the Scientific and Technological Commission in the province which have resisted the revolutionary activities of the 18 August Group.

para 4/12/6

Dear John,

There was a short article of some interest in the People's Daily of 31 May about KMT troops on the Yunnan border in South-West China.

2. According to the article, 47 officers and men of the KMT who had been wandering about outside the borders of Yunnan recently decided to stop selling out to US imperialism and Chiang Kai-shek, and to lay down their arms and return to the motherland. The group is said to have included one officer of battalion commander, company commander and platoon commander rank respectively. They surrendered one '60' type artillery piece, one light machine-gun, thirty-three small arms, and more than 3,000 rounds of ammunition. The article says the local PLA held a mass rally on 23 May to welcome back the repentant and presented them individually with rewards (chiang chin). The ex-KMT men were reportedly very moved at the lenient treatment they received. The same article reports that since January this year another 16 KMT officers and men have given themselves up, bringing with them one light machine-gun, five small arms and 191 rounds of ammunition.

3. The survival of remnants of the old Nationalist Army in the South-West border regions of China is beginning to assume an almost legendary quality. The leniency which, according to this report, is being displayed toward such KMT troops contrasts oddly with the current drive within China against people with alleged KMT backgrounds. It seems a fair conclusion that the present factional disturbances in Yunnan (see my letter PEK/7 of 7 May), which also embroiled the PLA, have provided an opportunity for renewed border harassment by pockets of KMT soldiery, and that the official encouragement and rewarding of surrender is intended to reduce this nuisance. That these soldiers are described as operating "beyond the border" rather than, explicitly, "from Burma" (their traditional provenance) is an added indication that the Chinese are here concerned mainly with the internal implications of this problem. Naturally it could not be admitted that KMT soldiers had been running round for years on Chinese territory, but in the mountainous and difficult terrain of Yunnan it would be no surprise if this was also true.

My Dear John,

In this letter I pass on to you various snippets of information arising out of posters seen or reported in Peking this week.

2. According to an East European colleague, a poster reports that Mao was shown during May, by Yao Wen-yuan, an article describing the experience of the Hsin Hua printing factory in "purging the ranks". In a directive of 19 May, Mao is alleged to have commented that this factory's experience was very good and should be copied by other units, and he put Yao Wen-yuan in charge of seeing that this was done. The rumour has arisen as a result of this poster (though it is not endorsed by the East European in question) that this directive foreshadows a new purge of the cadres. However, we think this inherently unlikely, and such an interpretation is not supported by current treatment of the cadre question in the central press. It is more probable that "purging the ranks" refers simply to the currently much publicised process of eliminating the last of the "class enemies", whether real or imaginary.

3. As I have already mentioned in my letter about Chou En-lai PEK/7, also by this bag, there have been reports of posters defending Chou during the past few days. I have seen one of these myself, which read as follows: "It will be difficult for the bosses of the Peking Engineering Institute East to escape their criminal responsibilities for disregarding the Peking Garrison Notice of 19 May and bombarding Premier Chou and Vice-Premier Hsieh". The details referred to in this poster are not known to us, but it should not necessarily be presumed that the attacks on Chou En-lai were explicit. It would of course be quite in line with poster lore that one organisation should blacken the reputation of another by representing their acts as an attack on the Premier. Nonetheless, Chou's name has not been raised in a controversial way on posters for some time, and it is not impossible that he should be a target for zealous radicals. In another poster we have seen, Chou En-lai is quoted as saying that the Politics and Law Commune (cheng fa kung she) of the Politics and Law Institute is "not reliable".

4. Poster attacks on Nieh Jung-chen (Chairman of the Scientific Commission) have been seen again during the past week. A typical slogan read "Pluck out the behind-the-scenes boss of Yang, Yu and Fu; bombard Nieh Jung-chen" (signed by the 916 Organisation of the ~~Seventh~~ Ministry of Machine Building). Other posters referred to one Chang Chen-huan (1728-7201-3883 or 1403) as the stooge of Nieh Jung-chen for the reversal of verdicts.

5. There has also been a new rash of posters proclaiming determination to "Defend Chiang Ch'ing to the death".

6. As for news from the provinces, a French colleague reported seeing a poster about Tibet which said that there had been bloody suppression of revolutionaries in Tibet by the PLA on 7 May, and that this constituted a repetition of what had happened in Tsinghai on 23 February. There are also reports that posters have once again attacked Wang En-mao, Saifudin and Wu Kuang from Sinkiang, but we have not seen them ourselves.

2 July, 1968.

My Dear John,

An Indian colleague has shown us some very interesting material about military conscription in China in 1968, with particular reference to Kwangtung province. The original text was an unsigned tabloid pamphlet which the Indians saw and translated fully in Hong Kong. My summary of this document is attached to this letter as an Annex: the summary is based on a written precis of the full English translation, supplied by the Indians, and my own notes made during a half-hour perusal of the full translation itself. The Indians clearly regard the substance of the document as authentic. There seems no reason to doubt this, although perhaps the exactness of certain figures to the last digit may be an editorial embellishment.

2. There are several points worth noting about this material. Firstly, although the document envisages a net increase of half a million conscripts for the Armed Forces in 1968, after allowing for replacement of demobilised soldiers, the two reasons given for this expansion are only partly convincing. The references to attacks by revisionists and imperialists seem little more than routine, and there is no attempt to develop the case for expecting an expansion of the war in Vietnam or renewed hostilities in Korea, or to explain why this involves such a big increase in immediate recruitment. Even allowing for an "active expansion" in Chinese military preparedness, the new conscription target is of an unusual magnitude. Moreover, although Chang Ch'un-ch'iao, in his speech of 4 April (see Ray Whitney's letter PEK/7 of 7 May), hinted that the PLA was over-extended on some of its internal commitments, one would have thought that in general the Army's involvement in running industry, agriculture and indeed government itself would become less arduous in 1968, now that almost all provinces have Revolutionary Committees, the cadres are recovering their confidence and basic order has been restored.

3. It therefore seems probable that another powerful reason for the increase in recruitment not mentioned in Huang Yung-sheng's report is the need to provide discipline and employment for the large numbers of young people who as Red Guards and "rebels" provided much of the impetus for the Cultural Revolution during the chaos phase of 1966-67. At a time when the Red Guard movement had already exhausted its usefulness to the Maoist cause and the general emphasis of press comment and propaganda was toward moderation, military conscription offered (as it still does) a simple solution for coping with the large numbers of

unmanageable/turks who have seemed unwilling to accept the approaching end of the present movement. In this connection it is interesting to note that half the conscripts for the Army and Navy this year, and more than 80% of Air Force recruits, are to be found from among students and "socialist youth"; and that the age limit has been extended by three years to produce a larger eligible conscript population. Another factor is that the influx of so many new recruits will have the, presumably desirable, side effect of making it possible for more trained soldiers to be diverted from internal non-military duties back to the Army's proper military functions, as Ray Whitney pointed out in his letter PEK/7 of 19 February.

4. Secondly, there has been a noticeable reversal on the question of educational standards of recruits. Whereas, for example, from 1962 to 1967 60% of recruits for the Army needed at least a lower middle school qualification, only 35% of those taken into the Army in 1968 will need to have reached a similar standard. The same is true of the Navy. In the Air Force educational standards remain higher than the other two services, but not as high as they were previously. The reason for this lowering of standards is of course to make it possible to implement the pure Maoist line as exemplified in Lin Piao's rubric that "three dirty artisans are worth one bourgeois Chu Ko-liang". The Army must be made up of people with the right class background and "political appearance", in order to prevent a reassertion of the bourgeois military line. This inevitably will involve a lowering of cultural standards if many otherwise acceptable recruits are not to be debarred from service.

5. It is worth noting incidentally that in commending the officers for their alleged opposition to P'eng Teh-huai and Lo Jui-ch'ing, the new Chief of Staff Huang Yung-sheng seems openly to condone insubordination within the military ranks - an admission which in his high casualty office he might have done better to avoid. Another point to which I would draw your attention is the order of the Military Affairs Committee that there is to be "no stupid peaceful reduction in arms" in Chinese policy toward the armed forces. The way that this is put suggests to me that there is a view held among Chinese leaders that military commitments should be cut down. Otherwise why do the Military Affairs Committee refute the proposition so forcefully?

6. As for the recruitment figures themselves, I shall not attempt to comment on them in detail, except to say that the national total of around 1,000,000 for conscription in 1968 is not wildly at variance with the figure we heard in February (Ray Whitney's letter of 19 February), and the 7.2% contribution from Kwangtung seems about right in view of that province's population.

ANNEX

Summary of a Tabloid Paper on Military Conscription.

The document was headed "Some decisions concerning compulsory military service conscription work 1968, throughout the province"; and sub-titled "A report by Comrade Huang Yung-sheng" with regard to certain Military Affairs Committee directives, dated 10 November, 1967 and delivered at a "Military Service Conference of Revolutionary Leading Cadres in Kwangtung at the level of special area and above". Forty-eight persons attended the conference, including revolutionary cadres at provincial and municipal level, from Hainan administrative area, special areas and military leading organs. It was presided over by revolutionary leading cadres of the Kwangtung Revolutionary Committee Preparatory Group.

2. Huang Yung-sheng began by saying that he had attended a "Compulsory Military Service Conference for National Conscription in the three armed forces during 1968" which had been held under the auspices of the Military Affairs Committee in October 1967. He said that during that conference Lin Piao had announced an order about conscription and a personal decision of Chairman Mao. Huang Yung-sheng said he would not pass on this order in full because it involved national military secrets. Perhaps his audience wondered what was so new about military conscription. The answer was that there were important changes in the numbers to be conscripted and in the principle of conscription. Dealing with the significance of the new contents of military service duties in 1968, Huang said that there would be new frenzied attacks by Soviet revisionists and US imperialists against the motherland in 1968. China could expect an expansion of the war in Vietnam and the possibility of renewed war in Korea. At the same time, people who claimed that the Cultural Revolution was in a great mess might encourage the KMT in Taiwan to counter-attack against the mainland. It was therefore necessary to take steps to prevent the imperialists from coming again against Chinese territory. In the future China would need not only a strong army but also a strong navy and a strong air force. Huang Yung-sheng said there had been an order from the Military Affairs Committee to the Ministry of Defence that there was to be "no stupid peaceful reduction in arms but active expansion in military preparedness". It was also necessary for the PLA to be strong so that they could discharge their internal responsibility of acting as a shield to the revolutionary masses.

3. Huang Yung-sheng announced that the number of people to be conscripted into the armed forces in Kwangtung province in 1968 was in total 78,650. Of these 45,617 were for the Army (41,968 male, 3,649 female); 21,235 for the Navy (20,368 male, 849 female); and 11,789 for the Air Force (all male). Conscription would be limited to unmarried persons between 18 and 25 years for all three forces. The political conditions for recruitment were that conscripts should be predominantly

.../the children

CONFIDENTIAL

CONFIDENTIAL

the children and younger brothers of workers and poor and lower middle peasants; and that in other cases the family from which they came should not be above middle peasant class. According to Huang, the "political appearance and social relations of conscripts should be clear and the thought and body should be healthy".

4. Cultural standards for recruitment were to be as follows: Army 35% lower middle school graduates and above, 65% upper primary and above; Navy 40% lower middle school and above, 60% upper primary and above; Air Force 65% upper middle and above, 35% lower middle and above.

5. In terms of occupation the division of conscripts was to be as follows: Army and Navy 30% students, 21% workers, 19% peasants, 5% Party members, 25% socialist youth; Air Force 60% students, 15% workers, 1% peasants, 2% Party members, 22% socialist youth. Students for this purpose were defined as those at school or who had completed their studies the previous year and were awaiting employment. Socialist youth meant unemployed youths.

6. Speaking generally on national conscription during 1968, Huang Yung-sheng recalled that regular conscription and demobilisation was the basis of the People's Liberation Army. He said that, in accordance with the decision of the Military Affairs Committee, a total of 495,675 troops from all categories in the three forces would be demobilised or used for special purposes in 1968. The number to be recruited during the year, to meet the needs of national military defence plans was 1,090,495. Allowing for the replacement of those demobilised, this meant a net addition in recruitment of 594,810. The contribution of Kwangtung province to the total national conscription quota was 7.2%; this was based on the province's population and the special conditions of military recruitment obtaining in the province. The reason for the expansion was firstly to repel the imperialists and secondly to enable the PLA to take the full burden of its three supports and two military duties responsibilities. The increase in the recruitment of females for the Army and the Navy was in order to meet the needs of cultural work, nursing and hygiene.

7. Commenting on the substance of his report, Huang Yung-sheng noted that the recruitment age had been altered from 18 - 22, as it was from 1962-1967, to 18 - 25 in 1968. The most important thing was the lowering of the education standard demanded for recruitment in the three forces. He recalled that from 1962 - 1967 the standard fixed for recruitment in the Army was 60% graduates of lower middle school and above and 40% graduates of upper primary and above. In the Navy it had been 65% graduates of lower middle and above and 35% graduates of upper primary and above. In the Air Force the figure had been 80% graduates of upper middle and above and 20% graduates of lower middle and above. Huang said that the purpose of these old proportions had been to make it possible for people like P'eng Teh-huai and Lo Jui-ch'ing to promote the bourgeois military line in the PLA. However, their attempt had met with the firm boycott and strong opposition of the officers.

.../8. He

CONFIDENTIAL

CONFIDENTIAL

8. He concluded his report by conveying to his audience a new slogan handed down by Lin Piac at the national military service conference: "Rather have three dirty artisans of the proletariat than one Chu Ko-liang of the bourgeoisie". This would be the general political principle for recruitment in 1968.

9. The tabloid then gave the text of a Decision regarding the setting up of Temporary Military Service Committees at all levels throughout the province. These were to be responsible for implementing recruitment tasks during 1968. At provincial municipal and special district level they were to begin work by 20 November 1967, and were to be responsible to the tri-partite alliance leading organs.

10. Finally, the tabloid reproduced a Decision, dated 16 November, 1967, by the Kwangtung Temporary Revolutionary Military Service Committee. This gave the breakdown for recruitment figures in Kwangtung as follows:

The document was headed "Some decisions concerning compulsory military service conscription work 1968, throughout the province"; and sub-titled "A report by Comrade Huang Yung-sheng" with regard to certain Military Affairs Committee directives, dated 10 November, 1967 and delivered at a "Military Service Conference of Revolutionary Leading Cadres in Kwangtung at the level of special area and above". Forty-eight persons attended the conference, including revolutionary cadres at provincial and municipal level, from Hainan administrative area, special areas and military leading organs. It was presided over by revolutionary leading cadres of the Kwangtung Revolutionary Committee Preparatory Group.

2. Huang Yung-sheng began by saying that he had attended a "Compulsory Military Service Conference for National Conscription in the three armed forces during 1968" which had been held under the auspices of the Military Affairs Committee in October 1967. He said that during that conference Lin Piao had announced an order about conscription and a personal decision of Chairman Mao. Huang Yung-sheng said he would not pass on this order in full because it involved national military secrets. Perhaps his audience wondered what was so new about military conscription. The answer was that there were important changes in the numbers to be conscripted and in the principle of conscription. Dealing with the significance of the new contents of military service duties in 1968, Huang said that there would be new frenzied attacks by Soviet revisionists and US imperialists against the motherland in 1968. China could expect an expansion of the war in Vietnam and the possibility of renewed war in Korea. At the same time, people who claimed that the Cultural Revolution was in a great mess might encourage the KMT in Taiwan to counter-attack against the mainland. It was therefore necessary to take steps to prevent the imperialists from coming again against Chinese territory. In the future China would need not only a strong army but also a strong navy and a strong air force. Huang Yung-sheng said there had been an order from the Military Affairs Committee to the Ministry of Defence that there was to be "no stupid peaceful reduction in arms but active expansion in military preparedness". It was also necessary for the PLA to be strong so that they could discharge their internal responsibility of acting as a shield to the revolutionary masses.

3. Huang Yung-sheng announced that the number of people to be conscripted into the armed forces in Kwangtung province in 1968 was in total 78,650. Of these 45,617 were for the Army (41,968 male, 3,649 female); 21,235 for the Navy (20,368 male, 849 female); and 11,789 for the Air Force (all male). Conscription would be limited to unmarried persons between 18 and 25 years for all three forces. The political conditions for recruitment were that conscripts should be predominantly

the children and younger brothers of workers and poor and lower middle peasants; and that in other cases the family from which they came should not be above middle peasant class. According to Huang, the "political appearance and social relations of conscripts should be clear and the thought and body should be healthy".

4. Cultural standards for recruitment were to be as follows: Army 35% lower middle school graduates and above, 65% upper primary and above; Navy 40% lower middle school and above, 60% upper primary and above; Air Force 65% upper middle and above, 35% lower middle and above.

5. In terms of occupation the division of conscripts was to be as follows: Army and Navy 30% students, 21% workers, 19% peasants, 5% Party members, 25% socialist youth; Air Force 60% students, 15% workers, 1% peasants, 2% Party members, 22% socialist youth. Students for this purpose were defined as those at school or who had completed their studies the previous year and were awaiting employment. Socialist youth meant unemployed youths.

6. Speaking generally on national conscription during 1968, Huang Yung-sheng recalled that regular conscription and demobilisation was the basis of the People's Liberation Army. He said that, in accordance with the decision of the Military Affairs Committee, a total of 495,675 troops from all categories in the three forces would be demobilised or used for special purposes in 1968. The number to be recruited during the year, to meet the needs of national military defence plans was 1,090,495. Allowing for the replacement of those demobilised, this meant a net addition in recruitment of 594,810. The contribution of Kwangtung province to the total national conscription quota was 7.2%; this was based on the province's population and the special conditions of military recruitment obtaining in the province. The reason for the expansion was firstly to repel the imperialists and secondly to enable the PLA to take the full burden of its three supports and two military duties responsibilities. The increase in the recruitment of females for the Army and the Navy was in order to meet the needs of cultural work, nursing and hygiene.

7. Commenting on the substance of his report, Huang Yung-sheng noted that the recruitment age had been altered from 18 - 22, as it was from 1962-1967, to 18 - 25 in 1968. The most important thing was the lowering of the education standard demanded for recruitment in the three forces. He recalled that from 1962 - 1967 the standard fixed for recruitment in the Army was 60% graduates of lower middle school and above and 40% graduates of upper primary and above. In the Navy it had been 65% graduates of lower middle and above and 35% graduates of upper primary and above. In the Air Force the figure had been 80% graduates of upper middle and above and 20% graduates of lower middle and above. Huang said that the purpose of these old proportions had been to make it possible for people like P'eng Teh-huai and Lo Jui-ch'ing to promote the bourgeois military line in the PLA. However, their attempt had met with the firm boycott and strong opposition of the officers.

../8. He

8. He concluded his report by conveying to his audience a new slogan handed down by Lin Piac at the national military service conference: "Rather have three dirty artisans of the proletariat than one Chu Ko-liang of the bourgeoisie". This would be the general political principle for recruitment in 1968.

9. The tabloid then gave the text of a Decision regarding the setting up of Temporary Military Service Committees at all levels throughout the province. These were to be responsible for implementing recruitment tasks during 1968. At provincial municipal and special district level they were to begin work by 20 November 1967, and were to be responsible to the tri-partite alliance leading organs.

10. Finally, the tabloid reproduced a Decision, dated 16 November, 1967, by the Kwangtung Temporary Revolutionary Military Service Committee. This gave the breakdown for recruitment figures in Kwangtung as follows:

In your letter FEM/7 of 2nd July, you commented on a tabloid pamphlet on military conscription shown to you by the Indian Embassy.

2. As you know we pass on copies of most of your reports of a China watching nature to the American Consulate General here and I asked Charlie Hill in the Consulate General whether this particular pamphlet had come to the notice of the Americans. I said that I had seen no reference to it in any of the Consulate General's translations. Hill told me that the Consulate General was offered this tabloid some time ago at a fairly high price. Before committing themselves they had carried out paper chemistry tests, compared type faces with those commonly used in China, and had carefully examined the style of the text. They had concluded that the document was a clever forgery and had told the seller that they were not interested. Hill said that in the event the magazine "Newsweek" bought the tabloid and a small piece based on it appeared in "Newsweek" a few issues back. The Indians seem to have acquired another copy of the same thing.

3. As you know there is a market here for almost any printed material emanating from the Mainland, and the production of forgeries is a thriving industry. The Americans by now have a good deal of experience in distinguishing genuine material from the local product and I would be inclined to accept their judgement.

4. I am sending copies of this letter to J.D.I. Boyd in the Far Eastern Department and to the other recipients of your letter.

My Dear John,

You may care to know that, according to the Polish Assistant Military Attaché here, new units of the PLA were moved into Canton on 12 July. Our source said that they came from the 55th Army and he thought they might previously have been stationed in Szechuan. Apparently they were adopting far more forceful means of dealing with the disturbances in Canton than those employed by their predecessors (from the 47th Army).

2. We are not ourselves able to confirm this report by any independent information. However, it is worth passing on to you, particularly since the Poles maintain a Consulate in Canton.

I am sending a copy of this letter to Ashworth and McLaren in Hong Kong.

CHINA: SUMMARY OF A TABLOID ON MILITARY CONSCRIPTION

(REF: PEK/7 of 2 JUL 68)

1. The net increase of half a million men in the Armed Forces for 1968 commands credence, but rather within the context of political expediency (as suggested in para 3; also in para 26 of Flag 'A') than that of the strategic eventuality alleged in the basic document to be the main reason for the expansion. The calls for 'war preparedness' appear, moreover, to be less than in 1964/5.
2. A TAIWAN analysis of recruitment for this year (Flag 'B'), perhaps surprisingly, does not, however, suggest a net increase in personnel strength for the Armed Forces.
3. The ~~Chargé's~~ forecast (in para 2) that in general the Army's involvement in the civil sphere in 1968 would become less arduous is not easy to reconcile with the well publicised requirement for the formation of Three-in-One Alliances in depth, nor with the statement in the basic document that the expansion was secondarily to enable the PLA to take the full burden of its 'three supports and two military duties' responsibilities. The speech by a Secretary of the Shanghai Municipal Committee on 4th April (Chang - PEK/7 of 7 May referred to in para 2) pointed to widespread demand, in Shanghai, for PLA representatives to take part in Alliances; and made clear that the requirement was not being met; but emphasized that to weaken the strategic dispositions of the Forces, to this end, would be very dangerous.
4. There has so far only been fragmentary evidence of the Army handing over civil commitments to their proper authority. We would suggest, furthermore, that this process could cover a considerable period, during which the Armed Forces would seem likely to have to remain continuously available and ready to take on these commitments anew. This unsatisfactory situation must at least continue until the Party's authority has been restored - including that of Public Security Bureaux and the Police - and a Party Congress held, but this event may not take place until next year, although forecast for this, in view of the slow progress made.
5. The case for an expansion in the personnel strength of the Armed Forces would thus seem compelling; but if a large influx of recruits were to take place, some dilution of overall personnel quality must be inevitable: in view of the premiums on training time which the still very great civil commitments must set, quite apart from the admitted lowering of educational standards. The continuing emphasis on People's Warfare (as opposed to 'open warfare') and on political qualities (which People's Warfare entails), suggest that this dilution of standard is acceptable to the leadership.

/of the ....

Conclusions

6. The case for an expansion in the personnel strength of the PLA is strong, both within the context of political expediency (in order to absorb troublesome Red Guards) and by virtue of the large, and by no means fulfilled, PLA commitment to take part in Three-in-One Alliances.
7. An, as yet, unsubstantiated figure of half a million has been reported as the net increase for 1968. A large expansion, of this magnitude, must entail a dilution of overall personnel quality, but the continuing emphasis on People's type warfare, which would not require such high standards of technical training as open warfare, suggests that this dilution is acceptable.

Annex A

CHINA: SOME PERSONNEL ISSUES AFFECTING THE PLA DURING THE 60'S

Introduction

1. In September 1959, P'eng Te Huai (the Minister of Defence) and Huang Ké Ch'eng (the Chief of Staff) were removed from office and replaced by Lin Piao and Lo Jui Ch'ing: apparently on the grounds of P'eng's criticism of the Great Leap Forward and People's Communes at the July meeting of the Central Committee (CCP) in Lushan (Kiangsi); and of his heading the so-called Anti-Party Group, which stood accused of trying to do away with the Party's absolute leadership over the Army; to abolish Army political work and civil construction duties; and to disband the Militia.

2. The cumulative effects of the Great Leap Forward, launched in 1958, and the stark reality of the abrogation by the Soviet Union, in June 1959, of the 1957 'Agreement for New Technology in National Defence' cast a shadow over the prospects of modernization and advancement in all fields that was to be hardened by China's increasing isolation from the comity of nations, owing to the intransigence of Maoist policies. The outlook for the future evidently led to the conviction, in the leading hierarchy, that spiritual values must be called upon to offset as far as possible the debilitating effects upon morale of the material shortcomings.

The reassertion of the primacy of ideology

3. In October 1960, at a time when military morale had been adversely affected by the agricultural crisis; and when the withdrawal of Soviet technicians, in July 1960, had added to the shortage of technical staff, Lin Piao sought to balance matters by calling for a breakthrough in ideological work, on the basis of the 'Four-Firsts'. These had been formulated at the second Lushan meeting, in August 1959, when the 'bourgeois' military policies of P'eng Te Huai were criticized and the primacy of ideology reaffirmed.

4. The new political drive was endorsed by a resolution of the Military Affairs Committee on 'The Strengthening of Political and Ideological Work in the PLA', and was lent ultimate authority by reference to Mao's Kutien Speech of 1929 (Fukien), in which the first extended treatment of the question of political control in the Army was provided. (+ The Kutien Speech concentrated upon the creative use of political work in improving Army solidarity and discipline; the establishment of good relations with the people; and the erroneousness of conceptions such as the purely military viewpoint)

/upon the creative ....

In the latter part of 1960 and throughout 1961, a number of 'discipline enforcement campaigns' were launched as well, such as those of the 'Four-Good Company' and the 'Five-Good Soldier', all of which had primarily a political content designed to enhance fighting morale and political attitude. The theoretical aspect of these campaigns was supplemented in practice by the attachment of high-ranking officers and political cadres to Companies as living exponents of Mao's revolutionary will. As many as 51,000 were reported to have been detailed to implement the Four-Good Company campaign in this way.

The restoration of the Party at Company level

6. By 1960, a considerable deterioration in Party representation at Company level had arisen, partly because the prevailing policy of modernization during the period of Soviet assistance after the Korean War had led to enhancement of the Battalion and the Regiment at the expense of the Company. This trend was now reversed and the Company made the firm base for the Army's political and indeed operational control. A statement by General Hsiao Hua (the Director of the PLA General Political Department), in 1963, that the Company is the basic fighting unit, illustrated a fact that must by then have become well established.

7. In the same month that the Soviets withdrew their technicians, a concerted effort was made to restore Party representation throughout the PLA. The work of readjusting Party Branch Headquarters began in July 1960 and was completed in February of 1961. During this period, 82 per-cent of the total number of Party Branch Headquarters in the PLA were readjusted, the remaining 18 per cent being mostly those belonging to newly established units. The readjustment was carried out on the basis of the rectification movement of 1960. This movement exposed the existence of 143 (+) rotten and partially rotten units and 5,000 low grade Party Branch Headquarters (+) (Enlarged figure is 409). In order to retrieve the situation, 78,000 cadres from various levels of Party organs were sent into Company ranks to give assistance: many higher commanders directing the 'struggle' in person, on the basis of 'persuasive instruction', and through criticism and self-criticism.

8. An inspection carried out after the readjustment had been completed showed that of 20,000 Party Branch Headquarters in the PLA, only 5 per cent did not come up to standard; whereupon a new readjustment of these was initiated, to the extent that "not a single one of them would be missed".

/come up ....

9. Before the readjustment, the majority of Sections had no Party members; most Platoons no Party Cells; and in the entire Army, about 7,000 Companies had not set up Party Branch Headquarter Committees, and some had them only in name. But by March 1961, more than half of all Sections had Party members, 80 per cent and more of Platoons had Party Cells and Companies which had no Party Branch Committee established such Committees and Branch Headquarters universally established Liaison Committees. 229,000 new Party members were elected and unreliable elements dismissed.

Further regulations governing political work in Companies

10. In July 1961, Regulations were announced concerning 'The Administration of Educational Work in the Companies of the Armed Forces'. These Regulations were followed, in November, by the publication of 'Ten Principles', concerning political education at Company level; and by further Regulations of a similar nature, in March 1963. The publication of the Ten Principles, so soon after the Regulations of July, may be said, in the light of other evidence, to have been spurred by the existence of many shortcomings in personnel relations. The 1963 Regulations, on the other hand, may have reflected the continuing struggle between the 'professional' and the 'ideological' schools of thought. It is noteworthy that in February 1963, Hsiao Hua (who was to come under severe censure during the Cultural Revolution) appeared to emphasize the military role of the PLA, by his statement that: "the principal task of the Army is to fight battles". He also insisted upon the necessity of good military training, in view of the greater complexity of arms and equipment compared with the Army's early days. The charge of organizing competitions in military skills instead of promoting politics, is one that has been brought against Lo Jui Ch'ing, the Chief of Staff dismissed in 1965.

Personnel problems of a structural nature

11. There were also personnel problems of a purely structural nature, due primarily to the policy of modernization, but which were aggravated by the withdrawal of Soviet aid, such as: the excessive turn-over and numerous changes of duty among officers, especially among basic level officers in divisions and in regiments; the large transfers of qualified personnel as /Instructors .....

Instructors to military schools, owing to the increase in the number of students; the large number of promotions for organizational purposes, which deprived lower echelons of trained personnel; and shortages of technical staff.

The 1961 Provisional Regulations for Extended Service

12. In July 1961, Provisional Regulations governing the extended service of personnel on active duty were enacted, in order to meet the needs of modernization; to ensure that technical and other essential personnel were retained; and to increase overall operational value. The authority for the Regulations was based on the original 1955 Military Service Law, which stipulated that NCO's who had completed their terms of active duty could serve on extensions in accordance with troop requirements and out of personal willingness. The new Regulations evidently brought all conscripted personnel within the scope of the extensions; and rationalized a situation which had already existed for several years, apparently in rather arbitrary fashion.

13. Personnel envisaged for extended service under the new Regulations were mainly: those with technical skills requiring a long training; Section Leaders of all arms; members of first line Border Defence units of both the Army and the Navy; air defence troops; cavalry troops; members of the Central Garrison Division (Peking), and other units of similar nature; also members of units guarding secret factories. The proportion of total strength to be retained in each of the three Services was given as Army 23% to 25%; Air Force 20% to 25%; Navy 20% to 25%. Personnel serving on extensions were entitled to wear insignia specifying service of one to three years; four to seven years; and over eight years.

The 1961 bi-annual pattern of conscription

14. A bi-annual pattern of conscription was also introduced from the summer of 1961. The sources of conscription were almost exclusively those from urban areas and middle schools. These factors suggest an attempt to achieve greater flexibility in meeting regional and national requirements, and to secure recruits of a higher educational standard, though this was not to be at the expense of ideological reliability and physical fitness, for both of which particularly high standards appear to have been set in that year.

The "Learn from the PLA" movement of 1963

15. The continuation of adverse agricultural conditions through 1961 brought some relaxation of political controls in the civil sphere, but the improvement in agriculture in 1962 led to a harsher political climate and to the beginnings of the 'Socialist Education' campaign, which formed the basis of the present Cultural Revolution.

16. In 1963, a nationwide 'Learn from the PLA' campaign was launched as an instrument of Mao's policy for the progressive regimentation and moulding of the nation according to his precepts. The campaign entailed some deviation of effort for the PLA from strictly professional duties, but was nevertheless consistent with the idea of merging civil and the military identities into a single operational whole. The intention was to establish a complete network of political controls in the economy of the nation, similar to the system of political commissars in the PLA and staffed by demobilized PLA personnel. In May 1965, a Press report indicated that as many as 200,000 ex-PLA members were so employed. The campaign directly involved Military Region organizations in receiving political workers for instruction from Ministries; and in providing assistance in the running of political training courses. A number of serving officers were also given political and governmental posts concurrently with their military posts; and others were transferred to work in business and financial enterprises.

The Reactivation of the Militia

17. From the early summer of 1964, and especially after the Tonkin Gulf crisis of August, official nervousness at the possibility of foreign invasion - which was earlier portrayed by the movement of divisions to the Fukien Front in 1962 - became translated into a drive for war-preparedness, which was to take shape in: civil defence measures and urban evacuation plans; the reactivation of the Militia; and, in January 1965, in increased terms of service for the PLA.

18. A determined effort to re-exert discipline over the Militia (which had considerably decayed during the economic crisis) had been made in 1961; and although the military activities of the Militia were made subordinate to those of production, a sense of urgency was clearly detectable, in that year, with regard to the need to build-up the Militia as a strategic asset in national defence planning. The time-scale for the accomplishment of this Militia task was given as three years, that is by the summer of 1964, when the need for a well-founded Militia fortuitously arose.

19. The sudden, nation-wide reactivation of Militia training from the summer of 1964 - and which was to continue into 1966, until the conduct of the Cultural Revolution made this impracticable - must have accentuated problems created by the 1961 Militia build-up (when 57,000 PLA cadre took part in the work of 'strengthening and improving' the Militia and rural Communes). The Military Region Staff commitment, for the control and implementation of Militia training, and of joint Army-Militia exercises, together with the concomitant requirement for increased transfers of trained Army personnel as Militia Instructors and 'back-bone' elements, must have imposed an appreciable strain upon Regular training time and personnel resources. A very large number of Regular personnel of junior officer and NCO rank from the 'Old Guard' who had reached the limit of their career capability are reported to have been transferred in this way.

20. These transfers could scarcely have been made-good in the short-term, by recruitment. It is for consideration therefore whether some sacrifices in the organizational strength and structure of those formations and units without an immediate strategic role could have been made, in order to meet these extraneous commitments. Moreover, the 8-year reorganization and re-equipment programme, which may have started in 1961, gave some sanction for change. The statement of General Hsiao Hua, in January 1964, that strenuous efforts were being made to streamline the organization of the PLA; and the earlier emergence of selected divisions and companies having 'special status', all pointed to continuing developments and fluidity in organizational matters.

The 1965 Conscription Statute

21. On 19th January 1965, a new Conscription Statute proclaimed a general increase of one year's service for the PLA: Army four years (specialists and Public Security Force five years); Air Force five years; Navy six years (fleet) and five years (shore-based). At the same time, Ministry of National Defence Regulations provided for extensions of service in categories of up to eight years or more; and laid down a requirement of 25 per cent veterans (that is about 600,000 men, which approximates to a 'normal' year's intake) as compared with total strength, thereby setting a seal upon the Provisional Regulations of 1961. This 25% proportion of veterans was reported, in March 1965, to have been tried out for four years and now to be official policy.

2. A report on this new Statute and Regulations reiterated the need for specialist personnel, as the Provisional Regulations had done, and elaborated upon them from the aspect of morale and value-for-war, as follows:

- a. There are a great number of new conscripts each year, but they are of relatively low educational and cultural level and are unable to grasp modern techniques within three or four years. Therefore, terms of service must be extended in order to raise quality.
- b. If well-trained soldiers, particularly technical servicemen, were to leave the Services after their terms were up, the new conscripts would be unable to carry out their operational duties satisfactorily in case of war. Therefore, the military service period should be lengthened to ensure the maintenance of effective operational strength.
- c. In the past few years, there has been some wavering of thoughts and fear of war among servicemen, and the present number of experienced men is not enough to control the wavering. Therefore, the Ministry of National Defence must keep 25% of veteran soldiers in military units by extending their service.
- d. The Ministry of National Defence stipulates that, beginning this year (1965), there should be increased training of the "special-type" serviceman, so that they may be able to grasp modern techniques. The basic and 'back-bone' elements for training are: first-class Section leaders and old, experienced soldiers. Therefore, the continued service of these can be set at eight years or more, so that units will be kept permanently effective and capable of undertaking all operational duties.

The rationale of the 1965 Conscription Statute

23. The immediate effect of the overall additional year's service, proclaimed by the 1965 Statute, would have been to increase the personnel strength of the

/FLA, ...

PLA, through the retention of those called-up at the beginning of 1962 (Army), unless appropriate modification in the 1965 intake were to have been made and, at the same time, accompanied by a corresponding demobilization of personnel on perhaps the longer terms of extended service under the 1961 Provisional Regulations. The numbers conscripted at the beginning of 1962 may not in fact have been very large, partly because the intake had been spread bi-annually since 1961 and also because the Provisional Regulations would, ostensibly, have resulted in a smaller annual intake requirement.

24. A large increase in personnel strength at the beginning of 1965 might well have been regarded as detrimental to the PLA's best interests: given the increased training commitment for the Militia and the national pre-occupation with the fear of foreign invasion. The selective retention of personnel already trained must have seemed infinitely preferable, at that time, to an influx of recruits requiring training. There is also the testimony of Press statements, of November 1964, supporting a thesis of relative stability in PLA personnel strength. The source and means of expansion was clearly seen as the Militia, which was regarded as an inexhaustible fund of replenishment. Further, that the gigantic size of the Militia and the ready availability of its members - at least of those who are ex-regular - solved the so-called contradiction between the maintenance of a small Army in peacetime and the employment of a large Army in wartime. Statements of this nature interpreted in the light of the earlier, 1961, intent to improve the quality of the PLA's personnel holding, and of the limited material means available, all suggest that the purpose of the 1965 Statute was again to improve quality rather than to increase numbers. It could even be argued that the personnel strength was then, and is now, far too large, at least for open-type warfare. Conscripted was stopped in 1966 and 1967, apparently for reasons connected with the Cultural Revolution, but was restarted at the beginning of 1968.

The early 1968 conscription pattern

25. It had been rumoured in some quarters that a larger number of recruits were to be inducted than in previous years and that some modification of standards for acceptance was countenanced. A Soviet propaganda broadcast stated that 500,000 Red Guards were to be called-up; and another unconfirmed source that the intention was to call-up 350,000 immediately, mostly middle students selected from all parts of China; and to call-up a further 350,000 during the summer (that is, a total of 700,000, which is about the 1955 figure).

Moreover, information has been publicized that service in the Army is for two years and in the Navy for three years: thereby permitting a faster turn-over.

26. A policy of recruiting Red Guards into the PLA would afford opportunity for the selective removal of troublesome elements from the numerous revolutionary organizations and enable these elements to be disciplined. One report stated that conscripts would be given six months training and would then serve with the PLA for eighteen months, after which they would be given the 'option' of being demobilized or continuing in military service. Another report, referring to Kwangtung Province, cited the officially approved proportions of new recruits as 15% students, 15% young people who had been sent to the countryside; 30% farmers; and 40% other proletarians. These proportions suggest a manipulation of the intake in the interests of the current political situation, rather than in those of the PLA.

27. The decision to reimpose conscription could be regarded as a sign of confidence that the risk of throwing the PLA slightly off-balance, by accepting large numbers of recruits, whose suitability is perhaps open to question in some ways, can be accepted under present circumstances. The extent to which demobilization will take place in order to offset the intake is not yet apparent, but if the size of the PLA is to be maintained approximately static by demobilizing corresponding numbers of experienced, tested personnel, some impairment of the reliability and efficiency of the PLA could come about.

A new campaign for war-preparedness

28. During the early months of 1968, pre-occupation with the possibility of foreign invasion, and of the need for war-preparedness, emerged again, though not at the same intensity as during 1964/65. One result of the new campaign has been a call to rehabilitated and retired PLA men to be prepared to return to the 'front line' in uniform and act as 'backbone' elements in strengthening the building of armed units of workers. The calling-up of reservists in this way may possibly be designed to release Regular personnel from some of the non-military tasks acquired during the Cultural Revolution. Reservists are also being used, for purely Cultural Revolution purposes, to reorganize and to bolster organizations such as Public Security Bureaux and legal departments.

/Conclusion

Conclusion

29. The selectivity in conscription exercised during the earlier part of the present decade, together with the policy of retention of veterans, must have made singular contribution to the reliability of the PLA during the high tide of Cultural Revolution; it now remains to be seen whether the quality of personnel that has been achieved is to be diluted for political purposes falling within a more limited context.

(6) PARTICULARS OF CHINESE MILITARY RECRUITMENT FOR THIS YEAR. NO: 1217/68

From collected sources: Owing to the cultural revolution, the Chinese Communists stopped recruiting work for one year. They started recruiting again in November, 1967, and completed their quota by the end of March, 1968. Particulars of recruiting are more positive than in former years and the numbers recruited greater.

The quantity of recruits entered and soldiers retired amounts to about one third of the total Army, 800,000 men.

With regard to Navy and Air Force, signs of recruiting and retirement have not been noticed. But judging from the custom, the required number to match what has been recruited and retired from the Army would be about 200,000 men. It is therefore estimated that the number of recruits entered and veterans retired will run to one million.

But the Chinese Communist Army still contains one third who have done over their time, of the years 1962, 1963, and 1964. One third are of the 1965 and 1966 classes, whose time is not yet expired. So that although one third are new recruits, there is no visible effect on the Army's fighting strength.

Addressed to Foreign Office telegram No. 716 of 5 August.

52 — My telegram No. 704:

The army day editorial emphasises non-military functions of PLA, particularly in relation to revolutionary masses and revolutionary committees. The PLA are required at same time both to guide, and to respect the initiative of, the masses: requirements which reflect the different emphasis from moderates and cultural revolution extremists respectively within the Chinese leadership.

2. The editorial also reflects considerable official concern at problems facing revolutionary committees. The appeal to PLA to support Government and firmly back up revolutionary committees suggests anxiety lest army, which is the sole guarantee of social order, should become weary of its difficult role in protecting new regime from masses, and masses from each other. It is however hard to see how firm PLA backing for revolutionary committees, especially in places like Canton, can fail to attract criticism from militant revolutionary organisation.

3. The references to apathetic discipline and unity of the PLA suggest that there is already some demoralization within the ranks. The warning against losing one's political bearings may refer to Yang Ch'eng-wu. It is interesting that editorial does not mention discrediting of Peng Te-huai/Lo Jui-ch'ing line on army building: the theme may be too divisive for the present occasion, when emphasis is on internal and external unity.

4. In general there is less praise and more exhortation than usual and PLA seem less in favour than of old. The editorial even suggest strains between PLA (or more probably some provincial commanders) and central cultural revolution group. The Yang Ch'eng-wu affair is no doubt one cause; the army's impossible brief in dealing with the masses another. The Chinese attendance at the army day banquet (much lower level than last year's) supports this impression.

30 July, 1968.

My dear John,

We are always on the lookout for indications about the way political campaigns are being implemented in the PLA and the state of Army morale in general. For this reason you may be interested in a couple of articles in the People's Daily which appear to bear upon these subjects.

2. The first article comes in the People's Daily of 18 July.

It deals with the saga of a small cargo boat belonging to the South China Fleet. The boat only has a small crew so that on many occasions leading cadres have been left behind on shore. The boat has thus been under the command of more junior personnel. According to the article, both the ordinary crew members and these junior cadres showed some hesitation about plunging into the 1966 "Four Good companies" campaign when it was set in motion. The sailors and cadres were apparently infected with the bourgeois military thinking exemplified by Peng Teh-huai and Lo Jui-ch'ing as well as ideas about "doubting everything". As a result, in the latter half of 1966 discipline in the boat slackened and officers and crew found themselves at loggerheads. The article goes on to relate the history of various "Four Good company campaigns" which all ran into troubled waters though in the end of course everyone came round to the right way of thinking.

3. Other problems arose when certain crew members began to argue that as they came from good proletarian backgrounds there was no need to have so many political indoctrination lessons. What they lacked was not political awareness but technical training so that they demanded a reduction in the time devoted to political matters. This heresy was of course swiftly dealt with. Similarly, when the "Protect the Army, love the people" movement was launched last year, some cadres argued that they had gone through this exercise practically every year. They had got the point a long time ago and saw no reason to go through the whole rigmarole again. As a result, relations between the Army and the people suffered. The article went on to ask the pertinent question - why did all these heresies keep recurring when they should by rights have been discredited a long time ago? This was of course due to the influence of many years of bourgeois thinking among certain Army commanders.

4. The second article, which comes in the People's Daily of 20 July, is entitled "Discipline is the guarantee for the implementation of the line". It appears under the joint seal of the Liberation Army Daily and NCNA. The subject is a model naval unit No. 82 of the North China Fleet which has rarely put a foot wrong since Liberation. Nevertheless, the article makes clear that a good deal of propaganda was necessary against indiscipline and anarchist ideas. According to the article it was Lo Jui-ch'ing and Peng Teh-huai who were responsible for spreading these anarchist ideas as well as, paradoxically enough, advocating militarism and slavishness. The article goes on to repeat the standard ecceum that Mao's instructions must be implemented wittingly or unwittingly - any attempt to brand this as "slavishness" is quite impermissible. The article also emphasises the need to maintain discipline at the same time as improving relations between officers and men. Finally, the article ends up by asserting the need to maintain high standards in military training.

5. These two articles seem to me to show three things. First, the Maoist military line is still not being swallowed wholeheartedly in the Army, where the more conventional theories of Mao's opponents are still firmly entrenched. These heresies are not confined to senior cadres. The first article makes it clear that erroneous ideas about the need to concentrate on perfecting combat techniques sprung spontaneously from junior cadres and ordinary sailors. "The Four Good companies" movement, which has been closely associated with Lin Piao personally, also ran into difficulties at every turn. If, as the article seems to suggest, the Maoist line has still not won over even the lower ranks of the Army this has, of course, serious implications for the leadership. We have noticed that many recent articles in the People's Daily have portrayed Army men who have been assigned to factories as acting to some extent as political commissars among the workers. In other words, they have been making sure that while the workers got down to production they also kept up their daily quota of Mao-study. But if the Army itself is not convinced of the Maoist philosophy then clearly it cannot be expected to propagandise the present line effectively.

6. Secondly, the article appears to show that the leadership is concerned about indiscipline in the PLA. The successive public campaigns against top Army commanders such as Peng Teh-huai, Lo Jui-ch'ing and now Yang Ch'eng-wu must have undermined the confidence of the Army in its leaders. Some recent articles have even commended Army units retrospectively for resisting Lo Jui-ch'ing's directives when he was Chief-of-Staff. Moreover, the soldiers who are now deeply involved in civilian life cannot remain entirely immune to the general spread of chaos, indiscipline and the questioning of authority throughout society. It is possible too that the campaigns initiated by Lin Piao to bring the officers closer to their soldiers have contributed to a lessening in discipline.

7. Thirdly, the articles themselves, and particularly the second, appear to take a rather ambiguous line on the dilemma between emphasising politics or techniques and between democracy and discipline. The astonishing accusation in the second article that Peng and Lo were responsible for the spreading of anarchy in the Army seems to be in line with current attacks on Liu Shao-ch'i who is also accused of fermenting extreme rightism and extreme leftism at the same time.

Hitherto P'eng and Lo have mainly been accused of a totally different error-overemphasis on conventional Army discipline and Army tanks. In some instances the second article almost seems to be speaking with the voice of P'eng and Lo, particularly when it insists on the need to keep up military training. ✓

8. Although these two articles by themselves are anything but conclusive they appear to betray some concern on the part of the leadership about the depth of resistance to the Maoist line and the danger of a slackening in discipline in the Army down to basic levels. The leadership themselves seem to be in two minds about how to remedy these defects without appearing to step into the shoes of their opponents. ✓ With the Army apparently on the verge of taking firm action against Red Guard factionalism these symptoms must be disturbing for the Maoists.

Military Units

FC 1/5

Your letter PEK/7 of 7 May about Yunnan raised the question of the distinction between "local troops" and "independent units". The problem has been batted around between departments here and I am sorry for the delay. The agreed conclusion, in brief, and at the level of Theory, is this. There is as you know a broad division of the P.L.A. into Field Armies and Military District Troops. The former are in principle available for operations anywhere; the latter concentrate on the defence of their own localities in co-operation, when necessary, with the local militia. Within the first broad category there are distinctions between divisions at different states of operational readiness; within the latter a distinction between the Military District troops, properly speaking, and certain independent divisions of better quality whose function is nevertheless also a local one (this is the distinction referred to in your letter). The independent divisions are presumably put there to beef up the local forces, and perhaps they also have a role in offsetting the built in danger than such forces might go local entirely; but how they are formed or whether they are simply detached ad hoc from the Field Armies is not known here.

RECEPTION FOR 20,000 P.L.A. CADRES, 11 AUGUST, 1968.

The Army Day reception on 1 August in the Ministry of National Defence, unlike that of last year and recent receptions for P.L.A. cadres currently engaged in Mao-study in Peking, was not attended by Chou En-lai, members of the Cultural Revolution Group and members of the Political Bureau. Heading the Army Day list were four people - Huang Yung-sheng (Chief of General Staff), Wu Fa-hsien (Deputy Chief of General Staff), Ch'en I (Vice-Premier) and Li Hsien-nien (Vice-Premier). On 11 August another reception for P.L.A. cadres was held and once again Chou and other leading personalities were present.

2. The reception was for Mao Tse-tung, Lin Piao and other leaders to meet some 20,000 P.L.A. cadres among whom were:-

comrades attending Mao's thought-study classes for cadres of units of ground, naval and air forces stationed in Foochow, Wuhan, Chengtu, Kunming, Sinkiang and Tibet areas;

delegates to the second congress of "four good"
companies of the Navy;

delegates to the second congress of activists in the study and application of Mao's thought from artillery units stationed in the Peking area;

"revolutionary fighters" from various parts of the country attending Mao's thought-study classes.

This reception was the third of its kind since the beginning of June, each of them being attended by some 20,000 "comrades". On 3 June, especially mentioned in the preamble to the report were cadres of ground, naval and air forces stationed in the Nanking and Shenyang areas. The 30 June report specified representatives of units stationed in Tsinan, Kwangchow and Lanchow. "Areas" presumably indicates "Regions". The latest study classes thus seem to have been the third of a course designed for the Military Regions, all of which have now been covered with the exception of Peking (and Inner Mongolia if still a separate Region). The June receptions also included cadres attending other courses or conferences among them being "leading comrades" from areas not specified in the introductory report, e.g. from Sinkiang, Tibet, Foochow, Kwangsi, Kunming, Shansi. It would appear that these people were needed in Peking for discussions about problems in their areas. In August many of them were shown in the Regional list, while representatives from Shansi and Kwangsi, where there have continued to be problems, were specifically named but grouped with representatives from the Peking area.

The leading group in attendance on Mao and Lin Piao

/a 3. The list of those with Mao and Lin who received the cadres was almost identical with the lists for the receptions on 3 and 30 June. Li Fu-ch'un who on 3 June had been excluded from the group and placed at the head of the Politburo list, but who on 30 June had been restored to his position in the main group following K'ang Sheng, was again shown below K'ang Sheng. This suggests that at present he retains his standing in the central leadership. The only other point of interest in this group was the addition of Wen Yu-ch'eng who on the two previous occasions, and on Army Day, had been included among the group of "leading comrades of the General Departments, the Science and Technology Commission for National Defence and other departments of the P.L.A." Wen has risen rapidly; a rise, it would seem, linked with the rise of Huang Yung-sheng. Until late 1967 he was Commander in the Canton Military Region. In September, 1967 he was with Huang in Peking, and on 18 December he was reported as a Deputy Chief of the General Staff. In the last two months he has been present at the reception of distinguished foreign visitors, e.g. the President of Tanzania and the Foreign Minister of Pakistan. A Red Guard news item of 1 July this year (Survey of the China Mainland Press No. 4222 of 22 July) claims that Wen has been made a member of the "reorganised Administrative unit" of the Military Commission. According to this news item the unit now comprises Huang Yung-sheng, Wen Yu-ch'eng, Wu Fu-hsien, Di Tso-peng (Navy), Ch'iu Hui-tso (Logistics), Yeh Chun (Mrs. Lin Piao) and Liu Hsien-ch'uan (Chairman Tsinghai Provincial Revolutionary Committee).

The Politburo

4. There was no change in this list from that of 30 June, Thus Nieh Jung-chen and Yeh Chien-ying who have been under criticism continue to appear.

Departmental and Service lists.

5. The list of "leading comrades in the General Departments etc" headed by Su YU (Vice-Minister of Defence) showed little change from that of 30 June. Ch'en Hua-t'ang was added. He appeared for the first time in this classification on Army Day. In 1960 he was a Commander in the Foochow Military Region, and between July and October 1967 he appeared in Peking among "responsible members" of P.L.A. departments. He seems, therefore, to have advanced somewhat in the P.L.A. hierarchy recently. There did not appear to be any significant changes in the list of "leading comrades of the various services and areas of the P.L.A." headed by Hsiao Ching-kuang.

The Regional list.

6. All except six of the sixteen named had attended the June receptions. P'i Ting-chun, Deputy Commander Foochow Military Region, was an addition to previous lists. He had not been noted since November, 1966. Chou Hsing, Political Commissar, Yunnan and former Governor and Provincial Party Secretary, was also an addition, but was in Peking for Army Day, the first time he had been noted since December, 1966. Ngapo Ngawang-jigme, a Deputy Commander, Tibet, had not been present in June or on Army Day; his appearances since January 1966 have all been in Peking, usually as a Vice-Chairman of the National People's Congress. The two representatives from Chengtu (Liang Hsing-chu and Chang Kuo-hua) had attended the Army Day reception, as had Lung Shu-chin, Commander Hunan Military District. It is difficult to account for the inclusion of Lung, since if he is still a Commander in Hunan, there was no place for him, the Canton Military Region not being one of the areas specified. He may have been called to discuss problems of mutual interest to Kunming and/or Chengtu and was included in this group because there was no other convenient place to put him. He may, of course, have been transferred to one of the other Regions. Tseng Yung-ya from Tibet had attended the 30 June reception; his presence in August suggests, as does that of P'i Ting-chun from Foochow and Chou Hsing from Yunnan, an intensification of effort to deal with the problems of those areas.

7. A personality of particular interest in this group is Tan Fu-jen. He has appeared at other receptions among those presumably stationed outside Peking, but he has been difficult to place with certainty. He was once a Deputy Political Commissar in the Wuhan Military Region; but until recently he has been noted as a Political Commissar of the Engineering Corps. Comparison of the new list with previous lists now leaves little doubt that he holds a leading position in the Kunming Military Region. He has consistently appeared before Ch'en K'ang, a "responsible person" of the Region. Both Ch'in Ch'i-wei and Li Ch'eng-fang noted in 1967 as "responsible persons" have been criticised and have not appeared since National Day, 1967 when they were in Peking. It is probable that Tan is designated as the head of the Region.

The Peking, Shansi, Kwangsi list.

8. The first eight in this list were from the Peking Military Region and the Peking Garrison. A curious inclusion was Li Hsueh-feng, who is Chairman of the Hopei Provincial Revolutionary Committee. He had not attended the June or the Army Day receptions. His inclusion as a leading comrade of "the P.L.A. units stationed in the Peking area etc.", and his placing immediately below Chang Wei-shan, the acting Commander of the Region, suggest that he holds a position in the Region. Liu Ko-ping who followed Li in the list is First Political Commissar, Shansi, and Second Political Commissar of the Region. Li Hsueh-feng may therefore be the Political Commissar of the Region. The Shansi Revolutionary Committee was represented by Yuan Chen, Vice-Chairman, as well as by Liu Ko-ping. A strong contingent represented Kwangsi - Wei Kuo-ching (Political Commissar and former Governor), Ou Chih-fu (Commander), Wu Chin-nan, Wei Yu-chu, Chiao Hung-kuang (members of the Preparatory Group and "responsible persons" in the Military District.)

9. Appended to this list was "comrade" Yu Ch'iu-li, Minister of Petroleum Industry. He was not present on Army Day, but had attended the June receptions also in the also-ran position. He has been under criticism, and his presentation in this way may have been intended to show that no decision has yet been taken about his future.

SOME INDICATIONS OF DISCORD WITHIN THE P.L.A.

The Hong Kong U.S. Consulate-General's translation series Survey of the China Mainland Press and Selections from China Magazines have recently provided some indications of discord within the P.L.A. Allowance has to be made for the possibility that some of the "revolutionary" news sheets may not be reliable, but the items to which reference is made below have an authentic ring.

The Wuhan Military Region (SCMM 622 of 6/8/68).

2. In the first half of June this year representatives of the Wuhan Military Region were in Peking to discuss with central leaders certain problems, including "splitting" activities, affecting the P.L.A. in the Region. On 13 June Lin Piao issued instructions that Li Ying-hsi, a former Deputy Commander, should be detained in Peking and that "the new leadership of the Wuhan Military Region must be maintained". The Central Committee, also on the 13 June, discussed "the question of stability in the army" and the next day Chou En-lai telephoned instructions to Tseng Ssu-yü, Commander of the Region, making, according to an admittedly unchecked record, the following points:-

The Army must be united at all times. It must obey orders whether understood or not. Defiance of orders is intolerable, and to disrupt the Army's stability is breach of discipline and lack of loyalty to Mao. Only when the Army is stable will the Revolutionary Committee be consolidated and developed.

3. Trouble had evidently persisted in the Region after the Wuhan incident of 20 July, 1967. Li Ying-hsi who had been criticised in February, 1967, for trying to "seize power" in the Region, attempted to make a come-back after the Wuhan incident. He was accused of intriguing with civilians and some members of the Military Region to oppose Liu Feng, the Political Commissar appointed after the incident. This intriguing created bad feeling between Army units and dissension in the Hupeh Revolutionary Committee. Most of the senior officers involved with Li made a satisfactory self-criticism in Peking in June. Chang Kuang-tsai, a Deputy Political Commissar who spoke up for Li, and Pi Chan-yün, a Deputy Commander, were told to make further self-examination, but Li Ying-hsi was declared to have been the principal trouble-maker.

4. Chou En-lai, Ch'en Po-ta, K'ang Sheng, Chang Ch'un-ch'iao, Yao Wen-yüan, Hsieh Fu-chih, Huang Yung-sheng, Wu Fa-hsien and Wang Tung-hsing were present at the concluding session with the Regional leaders on 12 June. Tseng Ssu-yü and Liu Feng made the point that some people in Wuhan were making play of the fact that the "Party Committee" was called "provisional". It is not clear from the text whether this was a reference to the Party Committee of the Military Region or the representative group of the Party within the Revolutionary Committee. Chou En-lai informed the Chief of General Staff, Huang, that the Party Committee must not be a provisional but a formal one, and that the question of setting up the Party Committee organisation should be studied and a report submitted to the Central Committee. Ch'en Po-ta noted that some people were referring to the revolutionary committee as a "military government". This was a "reactionary slogan"; the Party's absolute leadership must be emphasised, for the Party must command the gun.

Shansi

5. We have recently seen a number of obscure references to what appears to be indecision or foot-dragging by the P.L.A. in its handling of problems in Shansi. The Mainland Magazine issue No.622 contains what purports to be instructions of the Chief of the General Staff issued on 13 May, 1968 to the Military Region on the question of Shansi. On 9 April Lin Piao and other leaders of the Central Committee had addressed "the whole committee" - apparently the Party Committee of the Region. Huang in his 13 May instructions, observed that "the failure to relay in full the speeches (of 9 April) ..... and to discuss them is a manifestation of lack of seriousness and sobriety."

6. It would be wrong to make too much of these isolated examples of problems in the P.L.A., but they could be indicative of a general malaise with which the Centre has had to deal in recent months.

DI.2 offer the following reply to the above.

1. Since the dress reforms introduced on 1st June 1965 it has not been possible to identify the arms to which members of the CCA belong. The CCN are however distinguishable as a Service by their grey coloured uniform, whereas the CCA and CCAF wear olive green.
2. Border Defence/Military Internal Security Troops (which form a part of the CCA) wear the same uniform as the CCA (and CCAF).
3. The Civil Police wear the same tunic as the CCA (and CCAF), together with the "Liberation" cap, but the trousers worn by the Civil Police are dark blue.
4. People's Public Security Troops (PPST), formerly known as People's Armed Police (PAP), and Public Security Bureaux (PSB) personnel, probably wear the same uniform as that of the Civil Police. It is possible, however, that PPST on field duty such as when operating in frontier areas may wear the same uniform as the CCA (and CCAF).
